CHAIR EID: With that, let's get started.

We will hear from witnesses on the Form 4 amendments first, followed by testimony on the amendments to Rule 29. All right. Our first person testifying today is Sai. I would like to call on Sai.

SAI: Good morning.

CHAIR EID: Good morning.

SAI: Good morning, Professor Hartnett and, Your Honor, the Chair, and members of the Committee. I am glad that this issue has finally gotten to the point of being moved to a rules proposal. The proposed form is certainly an improvement over the current one, but I believe it still has some fundamental flaws and some things that should be improved.

For one, the text of 28 U.S. Code 1915 and of the Prison Litigation Reform Act is very clear that the affidavit of finances is required only for prisoners. It says of things such prisoner possesses, and the word "prisoner" cannot possibly be read to mean person neither in the text of the statute nor in the context of the Act, which is how it must be read. Therefore, I recommend inserting a question at the

1 beginning, after the statement issues and before all 2 the other questions, which says, are you a prisoner?
3 If no, skip the rest of the form.

4           Second, this form does not give any 5 statement of the qualification standards, and without 6 a rooting in what is being judged against, the reasons
7 for the questions is not motivated and a person 8 filling it out cannot independently tell whether they 9 qualify. I, therefore, propose a statement of that, 10 but I will also speak it, namely, you will 11 automatically qualify for IFP status if (a) you are 12 not a prisoner and (b) either (1) you are on means 13 tested welfare benefits (2) you're represented by a 14 public defender or legal aid funded by the Legal 15 Services Corporation or (3) your income and savings 16 are both less than 1.5 times the federal poverty 17 guidelines published by the U.S. Department of Health 18 and Human Services. Otherwise, the Court will make an 19 individualized determination based on your financial 20 situation.

21           Obviously, that last part is only relevant 22 if you do not accept my suggestion for question zero, 23 which is that nothing is relevant to be stated unless 24 it is present. Likewise, what is currently Question 8 25 at the end about welfare benefits should be moved to

1 the top because it is really an automatic point, so I 2 would suggest rephrasing it to: Do you receive any 3 welfare benefits from income-based state or federal 4 government programs, such as SNAP (food stamps)
5 because that is the normal term for it, Medicaid, or 6 SSI, or are you being represented by a public defender
7 or by a legal aid program funded by the Legal Services
8 Corporation? If yes, and you're not a prisoner, skip 9 all the following questions. If no, or you are a 10 prisoner, for the remaining questions.

11 Question 5, assets should exclude the house 12 somebody lives in and the assets that they use for 13 work, like a computer or their primary car. The 14 prisoner assets paragraph should be moved after 15 Comments. The Yale commenters suggested putting a 16 caveat in front of it. I think it is much simpler to 17 just move it to the bottom and that way it is not 18 going to be confusing.

19 I would also suggest a couple more
20 structural changes. One is to make this form 21 automatically sealed with instruction to file under 22 seal. Second is to make it give community under 18
23 U.S. Code 6002, in accordance with the Supreme Court's 24 decisions in Simmons v. U.S. and U.S. v. Kahn. I'll 25 drop the references to those in chat and say what

1 circumstances will trigger a need to update the form.

2 Lastly, I would suggest that this be applied 3 to civil also, not just issued by the Administrative 4 Office, and, structurally, I would suggest that the 5 Committee have representation from pro ses, not just 6 people who have a structural bias to view pro ses as a 7 problem, and allow more participation in the 8 consideration process. Thank you.

9 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Now I turn to my 10 Committee members who have any questions. It does not 11 appear so. Thank you for your testimony.

12 SAI: Thank you.

13 CHAIR EID: Our next presenter is Professor 14 Judith Resnik and three others, Avital Fried, Anna 15 Selbrede, and Julia Udell.

16 MS. RESNIK: Good morning, Judge. I'm 17 Judith Resnik, the R.T. Lyman Professor of Law. I 18 hope you can hear me all right.

19 CHAIR EID: Yes.

20 MS. RESNIK: Is my sound all right? Good.
21 Thank you.

22 CHAIR EID: Yes, please proceed. Thank you.

23 MS. RESNIK: I'm never sure in technology.

24 So, first of all, thank you for this 25 opportunity for us to augment the comments that we

1 submitted in support of the proposed revision, and I 2 should just add the written testimony was submitted on 3 behalf of Law Professors Myriam Gilles, Andrew Hahn,
4 Alexander Reinert, Tanina Rostain, and myself, as well 5 as the other presenters here. We're augmenting to 6 give you a little bit more information we hope will be 7 helpful, and as we discussed with your staff in 8 advance, we'll then field whatever questions you may 9 have.

10 First, obviously, we're supporting the shift
11 to the shortened form and hope you say yes.

12 Second, I just wanted to provide a little 13 bit of background information about what we do and 14 don't know about people seeking fee waivers at trial 15 and appellate levels, and as you just heard, the 16 courts have often encountered challenges in responding 17 because the rules have been written with those of us 18 who are lawyers and becoming lawyers in mind. So it's 19 familiar, I assume, that about a quarter of the 20 filings at the trial level and more than a half on 21 appeal, as Appellate Judges know well, are people 22 filing without lawyers, and in an article we wrote, we 23 called them lawyerless litigants. Pro se is the term 24 of art in the Administrative Office tables.

25 And I've been working on a series of 1 projects trying to understand the use of the federal 2 courts managerial judging filings in state and federal 3 aggregation and more, and I wanted to know more about 4 the relationships between people who represent 5 themselves and the use of the IFP, In Forma Pauperis, 6 system. A new trove of data is now available. It's 7 called SCALES, which stands for the Systematic Content 8 Analysis of Litigation Events and which coded all the 9 docket sheets in 2016 and 2017 of federal civil cases, 10 and then the researchers issued a report that said, in 11 80 percent of the cases, people who seek IFP status at 12 the district court level get it. Well, it turns out 13 that when you dig deeper in, the coders were not able 14 on their first run to analyze a hundred percent of the 15 docket sheets but only 40 percent.

16 And so we went and looked at the District of 17 Connecticut, where we sit, and we understood why quite 18 quickly, which is what voters will call there's lots 19 of noise in the data because, in fact, you can't just 20 find grant or deny. Sometimes you find submit more 21 information or tell us more or back and forth that 22 make it harder to put things in easy boxes. The 23 punchline is that this is a time-consuming process for 24 litigants, court staff, and judges, and the forms at 25 the trial level have not made it as easy as it could

1 be for any of them to work as required under 28 U.S.C.
2 1915, and so the simplified form that you're providing 3 is a great move forward and its uniformity will, we 4 hope, be a role model at the trial level as well as 5 the appellate.

6 It's also important to just flag that as far 7 as we know, we haven't been able to find research on 8 grant/deny rates at the appellate level or just the 9 practices or processes. There are a few Federal 10 Judicial Center reports that address it. And so the 11 other point to underscore is that by creating 12 uniformity, it'll save Administrative Office staff 13 time in training staff and then in coding materials, 14 and we can all have a system be more fair, more 15 accurate, and more uniform.

16 And I was just reading the Federal 17 Judiciary's long-range plan for information technology 18 for its looking forward in 2025. I think these moves 19 are completely consistent with that enterprise, and we 20 applaud the movement forward and hope you will spread 21 your wings across the rulemaking process.

22 I now turn to introduce Avital Fried, who 23 will add, again, briefly. We're aiming to be right 24 under your time limits. Thank you, and I'll mute 25 myself but stay on camera for a moment more.

1 CHAIR EID: Thank you.

2 MS. FRIED: Good morning, Your Honor, and 3 thank you for the opportunity to be here this morning.
4 My name is Avital Fried, and I'm a second-year student 5 at Yale Law School. As the Advisory Committee has 6 already identified, the current IFP application 7 process in federal courts can be challenging both for 8 litigants and for court staff and, as Professor Resnik
9 mentioned, our research primarily focused on district
10 court IFP forms, but we've also looked at the IFP 11 forms available online for the different circuits. We 12 were pleased to see more uniformity across the 13 appellate courts than we did at the district court 14 level.

15 We also noticed some differences across 16 circuits both in terms of the content and formatting.
17 For instance, some forms still request Social Security 18 numbers. We know that that's something that can 19 sometimes be missed and not removed before docketing
20 as a mistake, leading Social Security numbers to end 21 up online. We know that the Committee has identified 22 this privacy concern in the past, and we believe that 23 having a new form, such as the one proposed, will 24 solve that problem because it'll give circuits an 25 opportunity to refresh their forms and resolve that

1 issue.

2 We also notice that the formatting varies 3 quite a bit across circuits. For instance, some 4 circuits offer a fillable Form 4, which can be really 5 helpful for litigants. What's great about a fillable
6 form is that people with computers can fill it out 7 more easily online and people without computers can 8 print it out and fill it out by hand. Some circuits 9 also include a link to instructions for how to fill 10 out the form, which we think is great.

11 It's also the case that the current forms, 12 like many of the forms we reviewed at the district 13 court level, can be confusing to litigants, and when 14 forms are confusing to litigants, they're more likely 15 to fill them out improperly or incorrectly, so then, 16 when court staff are reviewing those forms, they may 17 get into a back and forth to get the needed
18 information in order to make an IFP determination.
19 For self-represented litigants, this could mean that 20 their case might not be able to go forward because of 21 a mistake in an IFP application, and that has been 22 noticed in the past.

23 Judge Rosenbaum on the Eleventh Circuit has 24 noticed that forms often fail to communicate the 25 consequences of their answers, and that can lead cases

1 to not go forward. We are excited to see that the 2 proposed Form 4 addresses many of these issues, and 3 with that, I will turn it over to Anna to further 4 elaborate on how the proposed form fixes these 5 problems. Thank you.

6 CHAIR EID: Thank you.

7 MS. SELBREDE: Good morning. My name is 8 Anna Selbrede, and I'm also in my second year at Yale 9 Law School. Form 4 effectively addresses many of the 10 difficulties with the current IFP process that Avital 11 identified by simplifying the form for litigants, 12 judges, and court staff, and asking only for 13 information that the court actually needs pursuant to 14 28 U.S.C. § 1915. This simplification aligns with 15 best practices highlighted by the White House Legal 16 Aid Interagency Roundtable based on recommendations
17 from legal aid organizations. The Roundtable 18 recommended simplified forms with plain language, 19 which would help to reduce the current burden from the 20 fact that 35 percent of individuals seeking legal 21 assistance need help filling out their forms.

22 Form 4 directly addresses that goal with its 23 simpler language and shortened two-page length. The 24 revised form is also supported by research produced by 25 law schools which have developed what they call

1 justice labs. These labs do empirical work to figure 2 out how to make it easier for people to use courts and 3 find ways to get remedies. These labs sometimes work 4 with courts and sometimes run experiments that have 5 people who are not in court fill out or use forms or 6 other tools to test them. These labs' goals are to 7 use innovative methods to help litigants provide 8 correct information and to help courts do better at 9 eliciting that information.

10           Stanford's Legal Design Lab, for example, 11 produced a filing fairness toolkit which compiles 12 evidence on the benefits of simplified forms and 13 provides directions to courts on how to make them.
14 The Harvard Access to Justice Lab is conducting a 15 randomized control trial right now on simplified court 16 forms. The lab is building on a preliminary survey of 17 22 states conducted by the Texas Access to Justice
18 Commission. In the survey, all states reported 19 increased judicial efficiency and economy from using 20 these forms.

21           Finally, we see the uniform simplification
22 in Form 4 as a model for improvements in district
23 courts across the country. As Professor Resnik 24 mentioned, we hope to see district courts follow along 25 by using simple, straightforward forms as well,

1 decreasing the differences and difficulties we saw
2 while researching for our article. From there, I 3 would like to turn it over to Julia to sketch our 4 small suggestions for the form.

5 CHAIR EID: Okay. Thank you.

6 MS. UDELL: Hello, everyone. My name is 7 Julia Udell, and like Anna and Avital, I'm in my 8 second year at Yale Law School. I want to reiterate 9 that we hope the Advisory Committee will approve the 10 recommendation to revise Form 4. We think highly of 11 the revisions and we support the proposal completely.
12 In reading through the revisions, we thought of just a 13 few minor suggestions to make the form even clearer.
14 I'll explain some of these, and then all four of us 15 will be happy to answer any questions.

16 So, to start, one minor suggestion is to 17 identify in Question 8 that public benefits programs 18 may have different names depending on the state. So, 19 in Connecticut, which is where the four of us are 20 located, the name for Medicaid is Husky Health. In 21 Delaware, it's called Diamond State Health Plan. In 22 Missouri, it's MO HealthNet. And in Virginia, it's 23 Cardinal Care. And they continue to vary state by 24 state, and so our hope is that by flagging this 25 variance with just, you know, an additional short

1 phrase, the new form will prevent confusion about 2 whether a litigant receives the relevant public
3 benefits that are mentioned in Question 8.

4           And for similar reasons, we also recommend 5 expanding the fourth question to include the phrase 6 old age or other dependence needs in its list of 7 necessary expenses. As people in the United States 8 are living longer, elder care has become an 9 increasingly substantial expense for many Americans.
10 Our hope here is that this minor tweak will ensure 11 that the form captures this financial obligation that 12 may affect an applicant's ability to pay court fees.

13           We also recommend modifying the first 14 question to read what is your monthly take home pay, 15 if any, from work? This small addition of the phrase 16 "if any" acknowledges that many applicants may not 17 actually have current employment income at all. We 18 think that adding "if any" will make the new form even 19 clearer than it already is.

20           Finally, we hope all litigants will be aware 21 that they can add additional explanations for why they 22 might be unable to pay the filing fees. As we 23 explained in our written comment, we noticed that the 24 current proposal invites litigants to add additional 25 explanations at the bottom of the page after the

1 paragraph that specifically addresses prisoners, so in 2 order to make sure that litigants who are not 3 prisoners also know that they can add additional 4 language, we encourage including the phrase "for all 5 applicants."

6 In sum, we hope the Advisory Committee will 7 approve these recommendations for submission to the 8 Standing Committee. Doing so will be a model for 9 clarifying and simplifying the IFP process throughout 10 the federal courts. Thank you, and we welcome your 11 questions.

12 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Does the Committee
13 have any questions? I do not see any. Thank you so 14 much for your presentation today.

15 MS. RESNIK: We appreciate your time and 16 that you enabled us all to offer comments. Many 17 thanks.

18 CHAIR EID: Thank you.

19 All right. We are now going to turn to 20 Carter Phillips, and we have now moved to Rule 29
21 comments.

22 MR. PHILLIPS: Judge Eid, can you see me and 23 hear me okay?

24 CHAIR EID: Yes, thank you.

25 MR. PHILLIPS: Okay. I apologize. It

1 wasn't clear to me whether I was controlling this or 2 whether the system was controlling it.

3 In any event, I appreciate very much the 4 opportunity to be here. My name is Carter Phillips.
5 I represent the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. I suspect 6 there will be a little more controversy with respect 7 to Rule 29 than there was with respect to the forms, 8 and I look forward to discussing it with you.

9 Let me just give you a little of my own 10 perspective on this because I guess, for me, the 11 hardest question I have is, why do the courts of 12 appeals want to deviate in their amicus practice from 13 the path that the U.S. Supreme Court has taken? And 14 the reason I ask that question is that, frankly, most 15 of my practice has over the years been at the U.S.
16 Supreme Court, and I have watched the amicus practice 17 there change pretty dramatically over time at least in 18 terms of the number of briefs, the variety of briefs.

19 And in that context, the U.S. Supreme Court
20 has obviously adopted a very liberal rule. It 21 eliminated both the requirement of consent and 22 motions. It freely allows briefs to be filed and 23 treats them as appropriate. With respect to 24 disclosures, it has the same disclosure rule that 25 exists in the current Federal Rules of Appellate

1 Procedure, which is obviously a party should disclose 2 if the party or counsel has, in fact, contributed to 3 the amicus brief, but, otherwise, the Supreme Court, I
4 think quite wisely, has protected the associational 5 freedoms or the protections that organizations have so 6 that if a member of the organization contributes to a 7 particular brief, and as long as it's not a party to 8 the case, that fact remains non-disclosed.

9 And I guess the, you know, fundamental 10 question I have is, you know, why-- or you might have 11 is, so what's wrong with disclosure? And, you know,
12 in the Supreme Court's cases, right, in the NAACP 13 decisions and the Court was talking about the very 14 serious risks of being identified in a particular case
15 and the consequences that would come from that, I 16 don't think those kinds of consequences arise in the 17 current world, but disclosure does carry with it 18 significant risks, and they're not risks that come 19 from the judiciary. They are risks that come, 20 frankly, from the Executive Branch or maybe from the 21 Legislative Branch, and I'll give you a specific 22 example in mind. This is not a particular case. It's 23 just a problem that I was thinking of as a 24 hypothetical.

25 So, if you had a Foreign Corrupt Practices

1 Act case that obviously affects anyone who does 2 business outside of the United States and an 3 organization is inclined to want to file a brief in 4 that case that would narrow the interpretation of the 5 Foreign Corrupt Practices Act, I can assure you that 6 no organization, no individual member of the 7 organization, is going to want to stick up its hand 8 and say I'm here arguing a particular position with 9 regard to the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act.

10 And the reason why they don't want to do
11 that is not because they're worried that the judiciary 12 would either react one way or the other to that but 13 rather that they say, well, now you're basically 14 saying to the rest of the world maybe you have a 15 problem under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act even 16 when, candidly, you don't or at least you don't know 17 that you have one, but why do you want to be 18 identified specifically under those circumstances?

19 And so the need for that kind of 20 associational protection is every bit as strong, I 21 would argue, at least in most contexts as it would be 22 in others, and, you know, anytime you're asked to make 23 compelled disclosures by organizations, you obviously 24 implicate First Amendment protections.

25 And I would urge the Committee to re-

1 evaluate in light of the fact that the Supreme Court
2 has studiously avoided creating those kinds of risks.
3 I don't see the point of chilling more participation.
4 You know, in the Supreme Court, I see in almost every 5 case I work on dozens, not always dozens, but at least 6 a dozen amicus briefs, and most of the court of 7 appeals cases I work on I see zero amicus briefs.
8 Occasionally, there are some. I'm sure there are some 9 cases that obviously generate more than others, but in 10 reality, any rule you adopt that creates a barrier to 11 filing a brief seems to me to chill free expression, 12 and, again, I would go back to the way the Supreme 13 Court looks at it and the way most lawyers look at it.

14 I mean, the reason why we routinely
15 consented was we expect the court to get the benefit 16 of the widest range of views, however expressed, on 17 the amicus side and for the court to evaluate them, 18 take the ones they like, discard the ones they don't 19 like, and make the decision based on the law. And 20 going beyond that seems to me all you're doing is 21 chilling speech or chilling organizational rights in a 22 way that's not warranted or at least I haven't seen a 23 problem that justifies making that switch.

24 Shifting gears slightly to the consent
25 versus the motion, consent motion issue, there, I

1 think you're creating a really cumbersome process 2 because, if your fear is redundancy, we'll start with 3 that one, the problem is that in the real world, I
4 usually am asked to write an amicus brief sometime 5 about a week or two before that brief is done if I'm 6 lucky. It's very rare that you end up coordinating 7 cases, especially in the courts of appeals, well ahead
8 of time, so the truth is I have no idea what other 9 amici are going to do.

10 And usually what happens is the party whom 11 I'm supporting files a brief, and then I have a week 12 to get another brief in, and most of that week is 13 spent trying to articulate what my client's views are 14 but also attempting to, you know, find something 15 that's not being covered by the party that would 16 nevertheless be helpful to the court, and what you're 17 asking us now is to consider the possibility of trying 18 to evaluate that as against all of the other potential 19 amici who may be filing, and, obviously, if redundancy 20 is the fear and it's difficult to coordinate, then 21 what you do is create a race to the courthouse, which 22 seems to me completely untoward.

23 It shouldn't be whoever gets their idea in 24 first then bars every other articulation of that idea, 25 and, more importantly, in a world in which we are much

1 more globally focused, I can tell you that the rules
2 that make it more difficult to file amicus briefs do 3 affect foreign entities significantly more than they 4 do domestic entities because --

5 CHAIR EID: Okay. I need to stop you there.

6 MR. PHILLIPS: All right. That's fine.

7 CHAIR EID: Can you wrap it up? Your five 8 minutes has expired.

9 MR. PHILLIPS: I've said what I wanted to 10 say, Judge Eid.

11 CHAIR EID: Okay. Thank you so much. Do we 12 have any questions from the Committee? I do not see 13 any. Thank you so much for your testimony.

14 MR. PHILLIPS: I think Professor Hartnett
15 might have a question.

16 MR. HARTNETT: Judge? Judge Eid? Judge, if 17 I can jump in?

18 CHAIR EID: Oh. Yes. Sorry. Go ahead.

19 MR. HARTNETT: Sure. Sure. Mr. Phillips, I 20 just want to understand whether your objection to 21 revealing -- disclosing financial relationships 22 between a party and an amicus is categorical or 23 whether the concern is with the percentage. That is, 24 you know, if a hundred percent of the resources that 25 an amicus have comes from a party, why shouldn't the 1 court know that?

2 MR. PHILLIPS: Well, yeah, no, that -- but 3 you're talking about a different problem. Look, if a 4 party is funding the amicus brief, that's already 5 required to be disclosed.

6 MR. HARTNETT: Right. No, but if it's 7 funding the overall activities of the amicus, if an 8 amicus has no resources other than what's coming from 9 a party, is there a categorical objection to that?

10 MR. PHILLIPS: Well, I've actually never 11 experienced that situation, so I'm not sure. I mean, 12 I don't know of any situation. I mean, I guess it 13 could happen, but I've never seen anything like that 14 happen, and it's obviously an artifice to avoid. I 15 mean, we don't have any problem making sure that 16 parties are not controlling amicus filings. You know, 17 I lived in a world before the rule was adopted where 18 that took place, and I think everybody was 19 uncomfortable with that, and I thought that was a 20 smart rule. But, to get at the problem you've 21 identified, Professor, it seems to me that you would 22 target that specifically in a particular way about the 23 relationship between the party and the amicus, not by 24 requiring more disclosure of organizations that 25 provide amicus support.

1 CHAIR EID: All right. Do we have any other
2 comments?

3 MR. PHILLIPS: Thank you for allowing me to 4 speak. I appreciate it.

5 CHAIR EID: Thank you.

6 All right. Next, we're turning to Alex
7 Aronson.

8 MR. ARONSON: Good morning. Nice to be with 9 you. My name's Alex Aronson. I'm the Executive 10 Director of Court Accountability. We're a 11 nonpartisan, nonprofit organization committed to 12 improving transparency and accountability within the 13 judicial system. I'm honored to testify here today in 14 support of the proposed disclosure amendments to Rule 15 29. We believe these amendments serve as a necessary 16 and very important step toward a fairer and more 17 transparent appellate process.

18 Of course, at their best, amicus briefs play 19 a vital role in appellate litigation, providing courts 20 with diverse perspectives and expertise, but as we've 21 seen and as I think the Advisory Committee has really 22 helpfully documented, amici can often act as alter 23 egos of parties or even third-party interest campaigns 24 with negative consequences for judicial administration
25 and fairness. Under the current form of Rule 29,

1 amici and the parties or third-party interests that 2 support them can essentially misguide a court and the 3 public by appearing independent from parties with 4 which they're associated through financial 5 connections.

6           This was the case, for example, in the 7 pending Ninth Circuit appeal in Google v. Epic Games, 8 where I served as amicus counsel in a little bit of 9 kind of a meta appearance in amicus briefs to 10 Professor Paul Collins, who's a leading expert on 11 amicus briefs and their impact. He's a political 12 scientist and a legal studies professor, and Professor 13 Collins's brief identified that of the 18 briefs filed 14 in support of Google in that appeal, amici associated 15 or on the briefs of at least 16 of those briefs had 16 documented financial ties to Google, and none of those 17 ties, importantly, was required to be disclosed under 18 the current version of Rule 29.

19           As the Committee has recognized, the 20 identity of an amicus does matter at least in some 21 cases to some judges, and members of the public can 22 use disclosures to monitor courts, thereby serving 23 both an important governmental interest and 24 appropriate accountability and public confidence in 25 the courts, and this transparency rationale applies

1 equally to knowing the identity of those who 2 significantly fund amici, as the proposed amendments 3 reflect.

4           The limitations of the current funding 5 disclosure regime allow meaningful financial 6 entanglements to go undisclosed. For example, a party 7 can fund essentially the entire amicus operation of an 8 organization, but as long as it does not earmark its 9 contribution for the preparation or submission of a 10 particular brief filed by that organization, the 11 organization's amicus filing need not disclose that 12 party's contribution in a case involving that party.
13 These limitations have fueled the proliferation of 14 what scholars have deemed the amicus machine, in which 15 amici under the control or influence of a party flood 16 the docket with highly coordinated briefs.

17           Indeed, this amicus machine appears to have 18 been deployed in force today here in this hearing in 19 organized opposition to the proposed amendments to 20 Rule 29. As detailed in our written submission, the 21 proposed amendments make several improvements that 22 will help deter disclosure avoidance schemes, and, 23 overall, the proposed amendments enhance the 24 adversarial process and promote fairness in appellate 25 proceedings, improving access to information about the

1 interests behind amicus briefs, and this disclosure 2 will help courts distinguish between genuinely 3 independent and expert briefs and those influenced by 4 undisclosed interests which can unfairly advantage
5 litigants by amplifying the arguments of deeper-6 pocketed parties.

7 I wanted to make one comment about the First 8 Amendment objections that some other commenters have 9 raised, and we think that the Advisory Committee in 10 its deliberations got this right. We believe that 11 these amendments are fully consistent with legal 12 precedent regarding funding disclosure, including 13 Americans for Prosperity v. Bonta, which,
14 incidentally, was a case that had an unusually high 15 volume of amicus participation for many of the same 16 interests that have shown up here to oppose the 17 proposed amendments.

18 And we dispute the right -- the premise
19 rather than there is a right to fund amicus briefs 20 anonymously or that disclosure obligations on such 21 funding require strict scrutiny, not least because, as 22 the Advisory Committee observed, a would-be amicus 23 does not have the right to be heard in court, and 24 there are numerous other fora available for speech.
25 But, even under that standard, the government has a

1 compelling interest in requiring disclosure of amicus
2 fundings for reasons articulated in the Advisory 3 Committee's memorandum.

4           If I have a few more minutes, I wanted to 5 note that while we do strongly support the proposed 6 rule changes, given the breadth of the risk that 7 covert amicus influence and control pose to the 8 integrity and transparency of the appellate process, 9 we do respectfully suggest additional improvements to 10 the rule. We believe that the 25 percent funding 11 threshold is set a bit too high as it allows 12 significant financial contributions below this level
13 to remain undisclosed. Practically speaking, a donor 14 that contributes 15 to 20 percent of an organization's 15 revenue still exerts considerable influence on that 16 amicus's operation and messaging.

17           And, second, we also support the request by 18 Senator Sheldon Whitehouse and Representative Hank 19 Johnson for a requirement of additional disclosure of 20 financial links among amici given the extent to which 21 we have seen this amicus machine materialize where the 22 party in interest might not actually be even kind of 23 funding its own operations but is actually itself a 24 part of the amicus machine, and we can see through 25 open-source investigative research or other, you know,

1 external documentation the financial connections among 2 the amici and connecting them to the party.

3 It should not fall on reporters or 4 independent researchers to document those connections 5 if they exist and they are meaningfully contributing 6 to the ways in which litigation is proceeding through 7 the courts. That's something that we believe is 8 important for courts to be aware of, for the public to 9 be aware of. That --

10 CHAIR EID: Thank you. I think that's five 11 minutes.

12 MR. ARONSON: Yeah.

13 CHAIR EID: More than five minutes.

14 MR. ARONSON: I appreciate your patience 15 with me, but thank you for having us and for your 16 consideration of these important changes.

17 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Does the Committee
18 have any questions? I do not see any. Thank you for 19 your presentation.

20 All right. We are now going to turn to Lisa 21 Baird.

22 MS. BAIRD: Thank you. As you said, my name
23 is Lisa Baird. I'm here today as Chair of the Amicus
24 Committee for DRI's Center for Law and Public Policy 25 commenting on the proposed changes to Rule 29. DRI is

1 the largest membership organization of attorneys 2 defending the interests of business and individuals in 3 civil litigation. Many of our 14,000 members 4 regularly practice in the federal circuit courts, and 5 DRI's Center for Law and Public Policy has an amicus 6 committee, of which I am the Chair, and we file almost 7 a dozen amicus briefs each year in cases that present 8 issues of importance to the civil justice system and 9 to civil litigation defense attorneys and their 10 clients.

11 We join in the thoughtful comments provided 12 by Mr. Phillips, and we find it notable that so many 13 groups with varying interests in political 14 perspectives in the written comments were united in 15 raising concerns with these proposed amendments.
16 We're also strongly of the view that the underlying 17 belief that seems to have motivated these proposed 18 amendments is that the courts should clamp down on the 19 number of amicus briefs is misguided and based on 20 misunderstandings about the role played by amicus 21 briefs and the value they add to the judicial 22 decision-making process when more perspectives are 23 heard rather than less.

24 That said, for my testimony today, I wanted 25 to focus some attention on what we see as the

1 practical problems inherent in the proposed Rule 29
2 amendments. Regarding the recommended amendment
3 requiring leave of court for non-governmental amicus
4 briefs, DRI's Center for Law and Public Policy 5 requests that the proposed amendment be rejected. As 6 an initial matter, I note that on January 6, 2023, we 7 wrote the Committee to recommend eliminating the 8 requirement of consent even, let alone court 9 permission, for the filing of amicus briefs.

10 We continue to believe that the Federal 11 Circuit should adopt the Supreme Court's current 12 approach as reflected in Rule 37. In announcing that 13 rule change, the Supreme Court Clerk explained that 14 even a rule that allowed filing of amicus briefs on 15 consent of the parties imposes unnecessary burdens on 16 the litigants and the courts, so when you go even a 17 step further and require leave of court for the filing 18 of amicus briefs, you're adding a requirement that's 19 all the more unnecessarily burdensome. In practice, 20 we think that this will result in a requirement of 21 motions for leave of court, and it will be a burden on 22 the courts as well as amici.

23 You know, you have the elimination of 24 consent. You have additional language suggesting that 25 amicus briefs are disfavored, so you are inviting and

1 encouraging not only motion practice but contested
2 motion practice, and contested motion practice over 3 amicus briefs is going to force the courts to devote 4 time and resources analyzing the motion and whether 5 that proposed brief meets the standard of helpfulness 6 that is in the proposed amendments and which a number 7 of commenters have identified as being insufficiently 8 defined and rather vague. Why not let the federal 9 appellate courts just get to the heart of the matter 10 of the amicus brief on the merits of the appeal?

11           If a particular brief raises 12 disqualification concerns, it can be stricken under 13 existing rules, but if not, the courts consider or 14 disregard that amicus brief once on the merits instead 15 of once in the motion practice context and again then 16 on the merits. In sum, the proposed amendment 17 eliminating the filing of briefs on party consent is 18 burdensome and impractical.

19           And I know I'm running very short on time, 20 but moving to the proposed amendments regarding 21 disclosures, we have no view on whether additional 22 disclosures are good or bad, but, to the extent they 23 are necessary, they have to be straightforward, easy 24 to comply with, and located in one place, and we have 25 outlined in our written comments why we think the

1 proposed amendments on disclosure rules are 2 unnecessarily convoluted, confusing, they're in 3 multiple places, and they will present a particular 4 challenge of compliance not just for, you know, amicus 5 like DRI that regularly appear but certainly for 6 individuals who may only appear once or twice in their 7 careers as an amicus.

8 The current disclosure rules are simple, 9 straightforward, easy to follow, and we suggest that 10 the proposed amendments on the disclosure be rejected 11 for practical concerns. Thank you very much.

12 CHAIR EID: Thank you. All right. Do we 13 have any questions from the Committee? I call on 14 Professor Hartnett.

15 MR. HARTNETT: Yes. Obviously, I defer to 16 any Committee members, but if there aren't any 17 Committee members, I'll list just one question here, 18 and that is, do I understand that the objection to the 19 standard, that is, that it bring to the court's 20 attention relevant matter not already brought to the 21 attention of the court by the parties, the notion of 22 it being of help to the court in briefs that don't 23 serve this purpose not being favored, do I understand 24 correctly that it isn't -- that that standard wouldn't 25 bother you if the consent option were maintained?

1           And the reason I phrase it that way is that 2           that language about being of help to the court and 3           that if it doesn't serve that purpose it's disfavored, 4           that is in the Supreme Court Rule 37, so I just want 5           to understand that the objections to the standard are 6           tied to the requirement of a motion. Is that right?

7           MS. BAIRD: The motion requirement is the 8           primary objection, but we think that there perhaps is 9           a misperception about the ways in which an amicus 10          brief can be of assistance to the court and, you know, 11          there's language about redundancy and other standards 12          that, if you're requiring motion practice, would 13          potentially require the court to evaluate and we think 14          that -- I can speak to what we as DRI do. A big chunk 15          of every decision we make as to whether to file a 16          brief, an amicus brief in a given case, is what can we 17          add that's new and different and important? What 18          context will we provide that no other party or amicus 19          is going to speak to?

20          We don't ever want to -- you know, we want 21          to be helpful to the court, and so that is -- and I 22          think you'll probably hear the same from most of the 23          other people providing testimony today. That is the 24          motivating factor behind any of these organizations 25          that have regular amicus committees that look to

1 participate in the judicial process. It's to provide 2 help to the courts in analyzing the issues. So I 3 recognize you need to have some standard about the 4 helpfulness of a brief, but the reality also is that 5 the courts, if it's not helpful, you know, it doesn't 6 get past the clerks. It doesn't get read. It 7 certainly doesn't change any minds. So that would be 8 my response there.

9 MR. HARTNETT: Thank you.

10 CHAIR EID: Anything else from any member of 11 the Committee?

12 (No response.)

13 CHAIR EID: All right. Thank you for your 14 testimony this morning.

15 MALE VOICE: Judge? Judge, I see a hand. I 16 don't -- I can't tell who it is. I think it might be 17 Lisa Wright.

18 CHAIR EID: Oh. All right. You're right.
19 Lisa Wright?

20 MS. WRIGHT: Okay. Here I am. Sorry, I was 21 having trouble unmuting. I guess my question is about 22 the concern about motion practice and if you are, you 23 know, asking yourself if we're only going to file this 24 brief, what can we add that's new, and, presumably, 25 that would be put in the motion, what do you see

1 people could say really that would defeat that such 2 that there would be any incentive to be having this 3 contested motion practice? I mean, if that's 4 articulated in the motion, I'm not understanding 5 really that it would be worthwhile for someone to try 6 to pose that.

7 MS. BAIRD: Well, the motion itself is an 8 administrative burden on the amicus party, and I can 9 speak for our organization. We have a set budget 10 that, you know, it's a line item paid out, you know, 11 set out from the regular dues of the paying members, 12 like the lights or the rent, and we have to parcel 13 that out to worthy cases. If we have to now add the 14 preparation of a motion on top of the preparation of 15 the brief itself, that will, of course, be a 16 consideration that will limit our ability to 17 participate in the judicial process, and it will 18 potentially lead us to not participate because we only 19 have limited resources.

20 But I would add that the briefs themselves 21 also articulate the basis of the value. What is new?
22 What is the different perspective? And, again, if the 23 courts -- why not just let the courts get to the 24 issue, right? Why make them go through this hurdle of 25 motion practice when, if they are reviewing the amicus

1 brief in the context of the merits, they only have to 2 do it once, so they're not burdened either, and they 3 can evaluate the brief in context. Is it adding 4 value? If not, it gets set, you know, aside in the 5 do-not-bother pile.

6           Perhaps the other factor is that -- well,
7 I've lost my train of thought, but, you know, I guess
8 what I would say from more than 20 years of experience 9 is, if you encourage litigants and lawyers to take -- 10 you know, if you give them an avenue and you suggest 11 that a motion should be opposed, they will oppose for 12 no other reason than to impose costs and burdens, and 13 that's why the current rule of, you know, this 14 professional consideration of each party granting 15 consent to anyone that wants to participate has become 16 the standard. You know, the approach is to be 17 professional and lenient and generous in granting 18 consent, and this proposed rule is going to flip a 19 switch, and once you flip that switch, you know, the 20 parties that are perhaps -- you know, they know that 21 they'll be on the other side of whatever brief you 22 file, they're going to fight it. And now we're in 23 contested motion land and the courts are going to have 24 to deal with that, and it seems unnecessary.

25           MS. WRIGHT: Okay. So you see it as if

1 somebody that was willing to give consent would then 2 file a motion to oppose just because?

3 MS. BAIRD: Yeah.

4 MS. WRIGHT: Okay. I understand. Thank 5 you.

6 MS. BAIRD: And, again, it's possible if --

7 MS. WRIGHT: Thank you.

8 CHAIR EID: All right. Thank you. Is there 9 any other comment?

10 (No response.)

11 CHAIR EID: Okay. Seeing none, I'm going 12 to -- actually, we're going to take the next three 13 witnesses. We were going to have a break here, but 14 we're going to move it after the next three witnesses
15 because we're ahead. So I'm going to call upon Thomas 16 Berry.

17 MR. BERRY: All right. Thank you to the 18 Committee for allowing me to testify today. My name
19 is Thomas Berry. I'm the Director of the Cato
20 Institute's Robert A. Levy Center for Constitutional 21 Studies. I'm speaking today in my personal capacity, 22 not on behalf of Cato.

23 I urge the Committee not to adopt the 24 proposed amendments. I agree entirely with the First 25 Amendment and donor privacy concerns that have been

1 ably addressed in others' comments. I will focus on 2 the proposed requirement that all non-governmental 3 amicus filers in the federal appellate courts must 4 receive leave of court.

5 Other commenters have noted that this would 6 add significantly to the federal appellate workload.
7 It would force federal judges to read and rule on 8 motions for leave to file when their time is better 9 spent on other matters.

10 I want to speak on what this change would 11 mean from the perspective of a frequent amicus filer.
12 I direct Cato's amicus program, which is one of the 13 most active amicus filers in the federal appellate 14 courts. We file roughly 60 amicus briefs per year. I 15 can say that there are at least three times that many 16 cases where we would file if we had the bandwidth.

17 Drafting an amicus brief takes our shop at 18 least a month from start to finish during which time 19 one of our attorneys works exclusively on that case.
20 Given the limited resources that all organizations 21 have, we have to make hard choices about which cases 22 we use our attorneys' time on. At present, we file 23 roughly 20 percent of our federal briefs in the 24 appellate courts and nearly all the rest in the 25 Supreme Court. But, if these proposed amendments took

1 effect, we have to seriously reconsider whether it 2 would make sense to continue attempting to file in the 3 federal appellate courts at all. If there were even a 4 one-in-four chance that a brief we submitted in a 5 federal appellate court would be rejected at the 6 motion to leave stage and thus not even read, it would 7 be difficult to justify dedicating our resources to 8 producing that brief.

9 Under the current Supreme Court rules
10 adopted in 2023, it's guaranteed the briefs submitted 11 to the court will be accepted for filing. As a 12 steward of Cato's limited resources and our attorneys'
13 limited time, I would find it hard to justify gambling 14 our time on producing an appellate brief that might 15 not even be accepted. We could instead spend that 16 time producing a Supreme Court brief that would be 17 guaranteed to be accepted.

18 This rule would not just reduce the number 19 of amicus briefs by rejecting some for filing, it 20 would also reduce the number of appellate amicus 21 briefs by causing many to not even be written in the 22 first place. Thus, I urge the Committee to consider a 23 likely unintended consequence of this rule. It would 24 incentivize amicus filers to focus even more on the 25 Supreme Court than they already do, and that is

1 precisely the wrong direction for amicus filings to 2 trend.

3           In my own experience as a federal appellate 4 law clerk, I saw that even in difficult and important 5 cases the federal appellate courts rarely receive 6 amicus briefs. When they do, they're usually far less 7 in quantity than the Supreme Court would receive in a 8 case asking the same question. To give just one 9 recent example, the Supreme Court received 30 amicus
10 briefs in a case asking whether the CFPB's funding 11 scheme violated the Appropriations Clause. The Fifth 12 Circuit below had received only one amicus brief.

13           If anything, the balance should be tilted
14 toward encouraging the dedication of more amicus 15 resources to the federal appellate courts and less to 16 the Supreme Court. The federal appellate courts 17 decide difficult and consequential cases every day, 18 and they usually do so without the benefit of amicus 19 help. I urge the Committee to look to the Supreme 20 Court as an example of the better approach to amicus
21 briefs. Yes, it's more expensive to file amicus
22 briefs at the Supreme Court due to printing costs, 23 but, nonetheless, the Supreme Court routinely receives 24 dozens of amicus briefs in its cases.

25           If that were a distracting burden, the

1 Supreme Court would have presumably made it even 2 harder to file amicus briefs, but, instead, it did the 3 opposite. It eliminated the consent requirement for 4 filing. Put simply, if a high quantity of amicus 5 briefs were a burden, the Supreme Court would be the 6 most urgently concerned with that burden. It's the 7 court that receives by far the most amicus briefs per 8 case, and it's telling that the Supreme Court has not 9 seen a need to restrict the number of amicus filings.

10 In my experience, when consent is denied and 11 we're required to move for leave to file, our motion 12 mirrors very closely the summary of the argument of 13 our brief itself. In practice, it would be just as 14 easy for a judge to read our summary of argument and 15 decide whether to read further. That is what judges 16 have done in the past. They should be allowed to 17 continue doing so without interposing an unnecessary 18 motion stage.

19 Finally, the limited time and resources of 20 amicus filers is itself a reason why amicus briefs
21 tend not to be overly duplicative. In my experience, 22 the major frequent filers on the same side of a case 23 will check with each other to ensure they're not 24 repeating each other. That's the smart thing to do 25 when we all have limited time. If there's no unique

1 angle to contribute in a case, I won't dedicate Cato's
2 resources to producing a me-too brief. The rational 3 interests of amicus filers largely serve to address
4 concerns of duplicative briefs. There's no need for a 5 motion stage to try to enforce an unpredictable rule 6 against being overly duplicative.

7 I welcome the Committee's questions.

8 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any 9 questions from the Committee? I do not see any.
10 Thank you for your testimony today.

11 MR. BERRY: Thank you.

12 CHAIR EID: All right. We're going to turn 13 to Molly Cain.

14 MS. CAIN: Good morning, Your Honor and 15 members of the Committee. My name is Molly Cain, and 16 on behalf of the NAACP Legal Defense and Educational 17 Fund, or LDF, I appreciate the opportunity to testify 18 today about the Committee's proposed amendments to 19 Rule 29. LDF has extensive experience submitting 20 amicus briefs to federal appellate courts, and based 21 on that experience, we would like to comment on two 22 specific aspects of the proposed revisions to Rule 23 29(a)(2) that we worry will have unintended negative 24 consequences.

25 So, first, we are concerned that the

1 requirement that amicus briefs be limited to relevant 2 matter not already mentioned by the parties could be 3 understood to say that any subject matter is off 4 limits if a party's merely mentioned it, even if the 5 party mentioned it only briefly, or if the amicus
6 believes that the party's discussion is insufficient
7 in scope or misguided in analysis. As a result, amici 8 might be deterred from filing briefs that would 9 helpfully clarify or contextualize party arguments.

10 We foresee a real danger that this language
11 will discourage rather than promote helpful amicus
12 participation. LDF puts careful effort into writing 13 amicus briefs that illuminate underexamined or 14 underdeveloped issues, but in doing so, we are always 15 mindful that American courts follow the principle of 16 party presentation, which means courts often won't 17 consider arguments from amici that weren't raised by 18 parties, so even when our amicus briefs strive to 19 provide important historical context or to elaborate 20 on the purposes or nuances of legal doctrine with 21 which we are familiar, our briefs generally expand 22 upon a matter that parties have at the very least 23 mentioned first.

24 And so we warn you that courts may interpret 25 this language to refuse consideration of helpful

1 amicus briefs simply because those briefs address 2 matters that the parties have already mentioned, and,
3 thus, we urge the Committee to delete the first 4 sentence of the proposed amendments to Rule 29(a)(2), 5 but if the Committee is inclined to include some 6 version of this language, we recommend that the 7 language be more narrowly tailored to discourage 8 amicus briefs that merely parrot merit briefs
9 arguments.

10 For instance, the Committee could state an 11 amicus curiae brief that brings to the court's 12 attention relevant points, matters, authorities, or 13 perspectives that are not redundant with the briefs
14 filed by the parties may help the Court.

15 And second, we are concerned about the 16 language in 29(a)(2) disfavoring an amicus brief that 17 is redundant with another amicus brief. We share the 18 Committee's goal of reducing the burdens imposed by 19 extraneous and unhelpful briefs. That is why, under 20 the current rules, we spend considerable effort 21 attempting to proactively identify other likely amici 22 and coordinate our efforts with those organizations, 23 and we often submit a joint brief on behalf of 24 multiple amici. For much of the same reasons judges 25 disfavor reading superfluous briefs, most prospective

1 amici try to avoid writing them. However, we fear the 2 specific language disfavoring amicus briefs that are 3 redundant with one another will prove difficult for 4 litigants to navigate and for courts to enforce.

5 Even with coordination, it is impossible to 6 predict what other amicus briefs may be filed or what 7 they will argue, and this is especially true because 8 amicus briefs supporting the same party share the same 9 deadline, and, thus, most amicus briefs will be filed 10 on the same day, and, therefore, an amicus will often 11 have no notice of what arguments would or would not be 12 redundant before they file, and then courts may lack a 13 principled basis for deciding which of the several 14 amicus briefs they receive on the same day will be 15 deemed the redundant ones and which briefs they will 16 accept.

17 Further, the proposed rule would likely 18 increase burdens on courts rather than alleviating 19 them because courts will have to review all the 20 proposed amicus briefs in order to police against 21 redundant amicus submissions, and this is a time-
22 consuming mode of review that is, at best, tangential 23 to the merits of the case. And imposing this 24 burdensome review is not necessary to achieve the 25 Committee's goals, especially because other proposed

1 revisions will meaningfully enhance a court's ability
2 to assess each potential amicus on its own individual 3 merits and will provide a robust filter for unhelpful 4 briefs.

5 So we share a common goal to ensure that 6 amici are able to participate in ways that are 7 actually helpful to the court of appeals, but it's 8 also important that the courts remain open to hearing 9 a variety of perspectives and are able to benefit from 10 genuine expertise, and so, for these reasons, we think 11 the Committee should carefully reconsider these 12 revisions that we highlighted to clarify the first two 13 sentences of proposed Rule 29(a)(2). Thank you.

14 CHAIR EID: Thank you. I open it up to 15 questions. I do not see any, so thank you so much for 16 your testimony today.

17 MS. CAIN: Thank you.

18 CHAIR EID: All right. We will now turn to 19 Lawrence Ebner.

20 MR. EBNER: Good morning. I'm Lawrence
21 Ebner. I'm Executive Vice President and General 22 Counsel of the Atlantic Legal Foundation. Our 23 organization is a nonprofit public interest law firm 24 that was founded almost 50 years ago. We focus on 25 cases involving civil justice from a free enterprise,

1 limited government, and sound science in the courtroom 2 point of view, and we often file amicus briefs in the 3 federal courts of appeals as well as in the Supreme 4 Court.

5 I'd like to emphasize, as have a couple of 6 other speakers this morning, the court of appeals 7 amicus briefs are very important. Because fewer 8 amicus briefs are filed in courts of appeals than in 9 the Supreme Court, we believe they are more likely to 10 be read and have an impact on judicial decision-11 making. It's important for the Advisory Committee to 12 understand that researching and drafting a court of 13 appeals amicus brief requires substantial effort, 14 time, and expense.

15 I personally am a very experienced amicus 16 brief writer, but it still takes me 50 to 75 hours and 17 sometimes more to research and draft an amicus brief, 18 and I'd like to list for you some of the steps 19 involved in strategizing, researching, and writing a 20 court of appeals amicus brief. The process begins 21 with carefully reviewing a steady stream of amicus 22 support requests that we receive at the Atlantic Legal 23 Foundation and deciding in which cases to file while 24 declining many other worthy requests for amicus 25 support.

1           After we select a court of appeals case for 2           amicus support, here's what's involved. First, 3           reviewing the relevant district court briefs,
4           transcripts, and other record materials; then 5           analyzing the district court's opinion. We then move 6           on to formulating amicus arguments that do not 7           replicate the supported party's arguments and, to the 8           extent possible, do not repeat other amici's 9           arguments, and let me say that those of us who are 10          experienced appellate attorneys take the admonition 11          against duplication very seriously and we invariably 12          try our best not to repeat arguments.

13                 Next step, researching and analyzing key 14          case law and researching and analyzing secondary 15          source materials, such as legislative history and Law 16          Review articles. That's very important for enhancing 17          the perspective provided by an amicus brief rather 18          than just replicating arguments. We try to draft a 19          court of appeals amicus brief well before the 20          supported party's brief is filed. In our experience, 21          the seven-day filing deadline for court of appeals 22          amicus briefs makes it impossible in most 23          circumstances to wait for the supported party's brief.

24                 It happens sometimes, but in our experience, 25          we usually have enough advance notice so that we don't 1 have to engage in that type of hurried exercise, but 2 we do review the supported party's brief as filed and 3 then make any revisions to our amicus brief draft as a 4 result of what we read, and it's a common practice in 5 appellate litigation, at least in the amicus brief

6 world, to share a near final draft of the amicus brief 7 with supported party's counsel and to consider any 8 substantive, not editorial, but substantive comments 9 that they may have, and that's built right into the 10 2010 comments to Rule 29 that this is not considered 11 asking the party to participate in drafting a brief.
12 It's an effort in part to avoid duplication.

13           Then there's polishing, proofreading, cite-14 checking, and finalizing the brief and working with 15 the printer and paying for its services. Nonprofits 16 like Atlantic Legal, with a small legal staff and 17 limited financial resources, cannot invest this type 18 of effort, time, and expense required to prepare a 19 court of appeals brief if there is any risk that the 20 brief will not be accepted for filing. Currently, 21 there is very little risk. Instead, there is what I 22 like to call a culture of consent where experienced 23 appellate attorneys routinely consent to the filing of 24 court of appeals amicus briefs.

25           In my experience over many decades,

1       oppositions are rare and, when they happen, they 2       usually come from trial lawyers who do not understand 3       the culture of consent or the civility and courtesies
4       routinely involved in appellate litigation practice.
5       Requiring a motion for leave would destroy or 6       seriously undermine this culture of consent by 7       inviting, if not encouraging, oppositions to motions
8       for leave, and I refer the Committee to our written 9       comments which explain in some detail the mischief 10      that would occur by requiring a motion for leave.

11                It would create a risk that an already-12      drafted amicus brief with all those steps, all that 13      time and effort and expense, will not be accepted for 14      filing, and that, in turn, would deter the preparation 15      and filing of amicus briefs that would be helpful to a 16      court of appeals in a particular case.

17                In our view, the Advisory Committee should 18      withdraw the motion for leave proposal. With due 19      respect, this proposal is a half-baked idea. Instead, 20      the Advisory Committee should follow the Supreme 21      Court's lead by amending the rules to neither require 22      consent nor leave for court of appeals amicus briefs.
23      I appreciate the opportunity to speak with the 24      Committee. Thank you very much.

25                CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any

1 questions from the Committee? I don't see any, so 2 thank you for your testimony. And we are going to 3 take a 10-minute break until, let's see, 11:21. Thank 4 you.

5 (Whereupon, a brief recess was taken.)

6 CHAIR EID: All right. I think we can 7 reconvene. Our next witness is Doug Kantor.

8 MR. KANTOR: Thank you for the opportunity
9 to speak to you. I'm Doug Kantor. I'm General
10 Counsel of the National Association of Convenience
11 Stores. I've been Counsel to our Association for 24
12 years. For 20 of those years, at outside law firms, I 13 was counsel to several other associations as well.

14 The proposed changes to Rule 29 do give me
15 major concerns, and I do think they implicate 16 important First Amendment associational rights, and 17 I'd like to give you a sense of the practicalities of 18 the advocacy that I do and that folks representing 19 associations do generally as to why these do raise 20 concerns.

21 Our association, just as one example, and 22 these associations come in many sizes, shapes, forms, 23 there are 152,000 convenience stores across the 24 country. Well over 90,000 of those, 60 percent of the 25 industry, are single-store operators. Very, very few

1 of our members have in-house counsel of their own.
2 They rely on the association to let them know when 3 there are legal issues of significance to -- or 4 potentially of significance to their business or to 5 the industry generally, and we have to balance all of 6 those interests and figure out when to deploy the 7 limited resources of the association to let courts 8 know how cases before them might impact this broad 9 industry.

10 And these things are not budgeted ahead of 11 time, right? We don't know what cases might be 12 coming. We often, as the Committee's already heard 13 earlier, get very little notice when we find out, oh, 14 here's a case that we weren't aware of but actually 15 may have a very significant impact on us, and so that 16 matters for quite a few of the proposed rules and the 17 difficulties with them. So one, for example, the set 18 of requirements on redundancy and perspectives. We 19 often try when we can, if we know other associations 20 may be interested, to try to submit joint amicus 21 briefs to help the court make it easier and provide 22 our perspective.

23 Sometimes we don't know who else is 24 interested. Sometimes we're surprised by that, and 25 sometimes even friends of ours we've worked with

1 before submit or don't submit in a way that is not 2 expected on our part, but the knowledge of that or not 3 is difficult in a coordination issue already. Adding 4 this redundancy requirement adds to that.

5 And, frankly, adding to the cost of having 6 to come up with a motion to justify why your 7 perspective is different each time is a huge concern.
8 These briefs are very expensive. We try to do very 9 good work and make them relevant to the court and the 10 case at issue, but there's a big cost factor, and 11 having a separate motion and motions practice related 12 to that will add very significantly to these costs 13 that are already quite high.

14 In a similar way, the identification of 15 particularly non-party funders is a major concern.
16 Most of the briefs that we do are just funded by the 17 association and all of our members generally from a 18 general fund, but sometimes we can't do that. As I 19 said, these are unbudgeted and often not expected or 20 planned, and sometimes we have to go to individual 21 members to ask for specific funding.

22 When we need to do that, we obviously pay 23 very close attention to making sure we follow the 24 party rules and we're not having parties to a case 25 fund those briefs, but that does not necessarily

1 indicate members that have some special interest in a 2 case that's different than the rest of the 3 association's members, and it often has more to do
4 with who we have tried to ask for funding more 5 recently and who we have not.

6 And we have to balance those financial 7 requests in a similar way that we do substantive 8 requests, and, frankly, even the aspersions that were 9 cast earlier about advocacy around this proposal, not 10 to mention other amicus briefs, I think are exactly 11 the reason why we have to worry about associational 12 rights here and the rights not to have to disclose 13 associational members and non-party funders of 14 particular briefs. That's important.

15 Right now, the system actually works quite 16 well in that consent is usually granted, folks can 17 move forward with certainty that briefs will be 18 accepted, and courts are free to evaluate fully the 19 arguments of amici and decide whether they're helpful
20 or not. We think that not having that same consent 21 system is very problematic.

22 I would also say the requirement of someone 23 having this 25 percent measure of the organization's 24 revenue and disclosing that is also problematic, and I
25 will tell you why. We, for example, and this is not

1 unusual, have many different sources of funding of our 2 association. It's not just membership dues. That is 3 something. We have a big trade show where members may 4 buy booth space. They may have dozens of employees
5 come attend the trade show. We have educational 6 programs. We have research offerings. We do not,
7 across all of these different revenue streams, account 8 for and conglomerate what individual companies pay in 9 all of these different areas. We would have to start 10 doing that if this rule went into effect in order to 11 continue filing amicus briefs.

12 It is, I think, very doubtful we would ever 13 have someone come anywhere close to the 25 percent 14 number, but we would not know unless we actually put 15 in a new accounting system to track across many 16 different business units and many different sources of 17 revenue where that revenue comes from.

18 So all of those new proposals present real 19 concerns in a system that, in our view, works well 20 today and where, in fact, the courts benefit from 21 getting a diversity of views from very different-22 looking interests and industries that they can take 23 into account as they see fit on a case-by-case basis.
24 So I will stop there and would welcome questions.

25 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any

1 questions from the Committee. Professor Hartnett?

2 MR. HARTNETT: Yes. On the earmarked
3 contributions for particular briefs, the proposed rule 4 lets you go to your current members. What the 5 proposed rule is trying to guard against is somebody 6 coming up to you and saying, hey, you know, are you
7 planning to file? No, I'm not. Well, you know, if I 8 give you a hundred thousand, will you file? Under the 9 existing rule, if that person says is there any way to 10 avoid having to disclose that I've given you a hundred 11 thousand for this particular brief, you say, sure 12 there is, just fill out this form and become a member.

13 Under the proposed rule, either you have to 14 be a member for a while and not simply have, you know, 15 joined the week before or a couple weeks before, or 16 you have to be willing to make that contribution to 17 the organization's general fund rather than simply to 18 underwrite this brief. Can you tell me a little bit 19 more about how that imposes a burden?

20 MR. KANTOR: Yes, and I really appreciate 21 you asking because I had meant to speak to that and 22 did not. So, yeah, so life is never as simple as we 23 would like it to be. We do have thousands of members 24 and we have a whole department, for example, whose job 25 it is to keep them fully engaged and make sure they

1       renew their membership on time every year, and many of 2       them don't, and it's a constant source of difficulty 3       and frustration, and so, at any given time, I may have 4       a member that in my own mind has been a member for 30
5       or 40 years who let their membership lapse in the last 6       12 months.

7                   And the only way for me to know that is to 8       go to our folks who are already quite busy tracking 9       folks down and trying to keep this machine running and 10      pepper them with these kinds of requests, and so it's, 11      one, a big administrative burden to do that. They're 12      already pretty burdened and would not appreciate me 13      doing that. And, two, it doesn't actually reflect 14      what I think you're trying to reflect in terms of 15      who's a member just for the purposes of a brief versus 16      somebody who, you know, we have administrative 17      difficulty making sure they pay their dues on time, 18      and so, you know, I would tell you that for whatever 19      it's worth, we don't -- look, we wish people would 20      just be willing to throw money our direction who are 21      not our members. It doesn't tend to happen, but we do 22      have this administrative issue with figuring out who's 23      been a member when and who's lapsed when and all those 24      sorts of things that is hard enough for us to keep the 25      association running.

1 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Anyone else?

2 (No response.)

3 CHAIR EID: All right. I don't see any more 4 questions, so thank you so much for your testimony 5 today.

6 MR. KANTOR: Thank you.

7 CHAIR EID: All right. The next person on 8 our list, Dana Livingston, is not able to make it and 9 is relying on submitted comments, so we're going to 10 turn to Seth Lucas.

11 MR. LUCAS: Good morning. So my name is 12 Seth Lucas. I am a senior research associate at The 13 Heritage Foundation and a law student at the Antonin 14 Scalia Law School, George Mason University. I want to 15 thank you for hosting today's hearing. I'm here today 16 to urge this Committee to withdraw, as many of the 17 people who have already spoken today, to withdraw the 18 proposed Rule 29 amicus disclosure amendments, which 19 I'll refer to for ease of reference as the association 20 disclosure rules.

21 As my colleague, Zack Smith, and I explained 22 in the legal memorandum we recently published and 23 filed with our comment letter, the proposed rules are 24 unnecessary, politically motivated, and 25 Constitutionally suspect. I will address why this

1 Committee has not provided a legitimate justification
2 for the proposed rules, while Zack will later address 3 the proposed amendment's political origins and their 4 Constitutional problems.

5           The Committee justifies the proposed 6 association disclosure rules by analogy to campaign
7 finance disclosures in voting. I would like to point 8 out that this justification flies in the face of 9 judicial impartiality and also is a post hoc 10 justification that was never raised during 11 deliberations about the proposed rules. As several 12 submitted comments have already ably explained, 13 judging is not at all like voting.

14           In an election, it does matter who or what 15 will influence a candidate's policy decisions if a 16 person is elected. Voters have an interest in knowing 17 that information, but judges have no similar interest 18 when deciding a case. Judges are not supposed to 19 decide cases based on who is on either side or the 20 changing winds of public opinion. Judges are instead 21 supposed to decide cases based on the facts and the 22 law. When judges look at amicus briefs as parameters 23 of public opinion or for indicia of what outcome is 24 favored by one's friends or political opponents, that 25 violates the principle of judicial impartiality.

1           It's one thing to use the identity of an 2           amicus or its author as a heuristic of the quality of 3           a brief or an indicator of what kind of argument might 4           be raised. After all, who wouldn't ignore a brief
5           from Seth Waxman, Lisa Blatt, or Paul Clement? It's 6           another thing entirely to weigh the merits of an 7           argument based on the identity of who is making the 8           argument or whom that argument might benefit.

9           Besides that, the analogy to campaign
10          finance is a post hoc justification never before 11          raised by members of this Committee. Not once from 12          October 2019 to May 2024 did anyone seriously contend 13          that judging is like voting and that campaign finance-14          like rules are needed. If someone did, it's just not 15          in the minutes for the public to examine. In fact, 16          the May 2024 memorandum regarding the association 17          disclosure rules is the first time this argument was 18          seriously discussed in the record. Instead, for over 19          three years, the Committee struggles to clearly 20          articulate a reason for changing Rule 29, as the 21          minutes evidence.

22          First, this Committee didn't consider 23          amendments at all. It was only contemplating what the 24          amicus act might do, and when the bill didn't move, 25          the Committee seemed to drop the matter, aside from 1 investigating who might be affected by its provisions.

2 Then, after receiving a letter from Scott Harris,
3 Clerk of the Supreme Court, this Committee does begin 4 considering changes to Rule 29, and when Senator
5 Sheldon Whitehouse and Representative Hank Johnson
6 contact the Rules Committee after this, this Committee 7 quickly assures them that it's already working on 8 amendments.

9           The Advisory Committee subsequently claims
10 that the Supreme Court had asked it to consider 11 amendments and that it wouldn't be right to say that 12 no problem exists and to do nothing, but Scott Harris
13 only asked this Committee to consider whether a change 14 was needed, not to actually amend Rule 29, and he 15 never said that the Chief Justice, much less any 16 justice, was interested in the question.

17           Moreover, he sent the letter only after 18 Senator Whitehouse and Representative Hank Johnson
19 threatened the Supreme Court with adverse legislation 20 if it didn't change its rules. To say that the 21 Supreme Court had made the ask was at the very least 22 an exaggeration. At other times, members tossed 23 around purported concerns about dark money, evasion of 24 existing rules, or a single person funding amicus
25 briefs to form a misleading appearance of consensus,

1 but none of these arguments stuck. None of them are 2 enduring.

3 When pressed for actual evidence of a
4 problem, one member who seemed particularly concerned 5 about the issue was able to cite only vague concerns
6 about evidence evasion and transparency and anecdotes 7 at the Supreme Court. When another member asked if 8 judges were actually being frequently misled by amicus 9 briefs, no one bothered to answer. Others expressed 10 skepticism that a problem even exists.

11 In light of this record, it's no wonder that 12 this Committee doesn't make an effort today to justify 13 the proposed association disclosure rules with 14 carefully articulated rationales developed through 15 extensive deliberations. Frankly, there weren't any.

16 After three years, all members could point 17 to as justification for the proposed changes were 18 unsubstantiated allegations and concerns that were 19 ultimately rooted in insinuations of misconduct raised 20 by a Senator and Congressman who were incensed by 21 judicial opinions they didn't like.

22 In sum, the only thing we all can agree upon 23 today is that, like Mr. Potter in "It's a Wonderful 24 Life," Senator Whitehouse and Representative Hank 25 Johnson are talking about something they can't get

1 their fingers on and it's galling them, and now, as my 2 colleague will explain later today, they want the 3 Judicial Conference to do what Congress rightly 4 refuses to do.

5 So I urge this Committee not to drag the 6 judiciary into identity politics by adopting what 7 ultimately is a partisan solution in search of a 8 problem. It should, therefore, withdraw the proposed 9 association disclosure rules. Again, thank you for 10 the opportunity to appear today, and I welcome any 11 questions you might have.

12 CHAIR EID: All right. Do we have any
13 questions. Professor Hartnett?

14 MR. HARTNETT: So I take it your answer to 15 the question that I had asked Mr. Phillips is yes, you 16 do have a categorical objection to revealing financial 17 ties between a party and an amicus so that if a party 18 contributes 100 percent of the funds of an amicus, you 19 don't believe that should be revealed?

20 MR. LUCAS: I would actually answer that a 21 little different way. The current rules aim to 22 identify when an amicus is just an arm of the party.
23 In other words, it's trying to prevent parties from 24 getting two bites at the apple. But the current 25 proposals are premised on a different inquiry, whether

1 someone is influencing amicus, but it seems that the 2 proposed rules want to have its cake and eat it too.
3 On one hand, the rules suppose that influence by a 4 party on amicus participation is bad and somehow this 5 needs to be disclosed.

6 But, as the notes to the current rule
7 explains and as members have repeatedly brought up 8 during deliberations, it's a good thing when amicus 9 are coordinating with each other and with the parties 10 to make sure they're not duplicating arguments, to 11 make sure that they're unique. And other people who 12 have testified today have explained that they are 13 consciously trying to prevent this. As the memo that 14 Zack and I published explains, the practice of amicus
15 wrangling and, in fact, what some call amicus
16 whispering is very common at the Supreme Court.

17 And the Supreme Court has loosened its rules 18 apparently in recognition that this is actually a good 19 thing when parties are having someone else go out and 20 help amici coordinate with each other to provide 21 unique and carefully developed arguments that aren't 22 repeating the party's decision. So, to answer your 23 question, the problem isn't money. It's whether the 24 parties are getting a second bite at the apple. The 25 current rules do prevent that, and the new rules are

1       premised on a totally different inquiry.

2               CHAIR EID: All right. Any other questions?
3       I see none, so thank you so much for your testimony,
4       and we are moving on to Tyler Martinez.

5               MR. MARTINEZ, Judge Eid and members of the 6       Committee, thank you for having me today. I'm going 7       to also talk about donor privacy issues. I wrote my 8       set of comments on behalf of the National Taxpayers 9       Union Foundation and People United for Privacy. Look, 10      we didn't file two sets of comments. We filed one.
11      We filed one together, proving that these things can 12      be done together and that sort of thing.

13              I have, you know, 10 pages. It's about the 14      length, ironically enough, of an amicus brief. I have 15      10 pages of law that I put in there, and the Committee 16      can read it, but I want to focus today on just a few 17      things from what we wanted to talk about and then 18      hopefully get questions because, at heart, I'm an 19      appellate lawyer and there's nothing worse than a cold 20      bench, so, hopefully, I can get some questions.

21              First, amicus briefs are good, especially in 22      areas of arcane law, like tax, National Taxpayers 23      Union Foundation, or campaign finance, which is where 24      I worked for 10 years as well, working on donor 25      privacy issues. These areas are full of traps for the 1 unwary, things where the statute doesn't necessarily 2 line up because it's been in judicial receivership

3 since 1976, for example, in campaign finance laws' 4 case. There's been all kinds of stuff that goes on.
5 We can be helpful. Now my day job is not to write
6 amicus briefs all the time. I write. Yeah, I 7 litigate. My main job is to litigate and protect 8 taxpayers all across the country at the Taxpayer 9 Defense Center.

10           When I have time, I write amicus briefs.
11 Ironically enough, I was up until 2 a.m. last night
12 working on a Supreme Court brief, but I write when I 13 have time to try and lend my expertise on some of 14 these really arcane, strange areas of law. So amicus 15 briefs are good.

16           Moving to my actual comments and hopefully 17 what this Committee is most concerned about, donor 18 privacy is really important and has been protected by 19 exacting scrutiny. Exacting scrutiny, as you all are 20 aware, requires a sufficiently important governmental 21 interest and that it be narrowly tailored. We already 22 know that.

23           What you might want to consider, and I think 24 where the Committee notes and proposals and comments 25 have been tripped up, is there's actually two lines of 1 thought on exacting scrutiny. There's the well-tread 2 area of law in campaign finance law where you have 3 people saying, oh, well, we're really talking about 4 issues, we're not talking about politics, and so a lot

5 of these cases are on the line between what is support 6 for or against a candidate versus talking about issues
7 that come up every year, you know, the hot-button 8 issues that people care about a lot that animate the 9 electorate. You know, abortion questions, gun 10 questions, tax questions sometimes, all those sorts of 11 things that really animate men are on the ballot in 12 the states or are major parts of political campaigns.

13 Those areas of law are well tread, and the 14 case of Nixon versus Shrink Missouri Government PAC 15 tells us that if it's well tread, you don't have to 16 put up a lot of effort into meeting exacting scrutiny 17 because the work has already been done. But, when you 18 do something new or when it's outside of campaign 19 finance, then it gets a lot tougher, and this is the 20 area that the Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 29 21 is going to fall into.

22 When you have this new area demanding broad 23 donor disclosure, you're going to have to prove it, 24 and when that was expanded in campaign finance law in 25 what was commonly known as the McCain-Feingold Bill,

1 which is technically known as the Bipartisan Campaign 2 Reform Act of 2002, the court case that generated that 3 created a hundred-thousand-page record. That's what a 4 showing under exacting scrutiny needs to look like.
5 That's when you're saying, okay, we're regulating new 6 areas of speech, new areas of core First Amendment
7 activity. Here's why we absolutely needed it.

8           And it passed. It passed Constitutional 9 muster. But, when you're talking about things that 10 aren't that, like Americans for Prosperity Foundation 11 versus Bonta, you have a situation where the 12 government can't meet that either as applied or often 13 facially, and you've already heard today that AFPF was 14 a big-deal case. It certainly was. It generated a 15 ton of amicus briefs at the U.S. Supreme Court. Why?
16 It was all across the ideological spectrum. You had 17 everyone from the ACLU to the Institute for Free 18 Speech to -- you had people all across the ideological 19 spectrum writing on this saying this is going to be a 20 danger to our operations, to the ability for us to 21 advocate on behalf of our people, especially on areas 22 that are hot-button issues that create a real danger 23 of threats, harassments, or reprisals.

24           So, at that point, it failed, and so I 25 caution the Committee to remember that you can't just

1 say, oh, look, this was approved in some campaign 2 finance case, though that often gives you the 3 articulation of the test. Campaign finance area has 4 been well litigated since 1976, since the passage of 5 the Federal Election Campaign Act in the wake of the 6 Nixon Administration's, shall we say, extracurricular 7 activities, and so, as a result, that is important for 8 the Committee to remember.

9 And, lastly, I'm happy to talk about 10 anything else that has come up here, but I was trying 11 to stay in my lane as exactly what these rules are 12 asking for, what courts always ask for. No one wants 13 to read duplicative briefs. No one wants any of that 14 sort of thing. But what you do want to do is get that 15 expertise, and sometimes the parties get the law wrong 16 and sometimes the amicus can help you see something 17 that wasn't there. And so I'll happily take any of 18 your questions. Thank you.

19 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have questions
20 from the Committee? Professor Hartnett.

21 MR. HARTNETT: You've heard this question if 22 you've been sitting there. Is your --

23 MR. MARTINEZ: I have.

24 MR. HARTNETT: So is the objection
25 categorical or is it to the percentage being too low?

1 That is, if we were dealing with, you know, 90 2 percent, 75 percent, you know, a hundred percent of 3 the funding of an amicus coming from a party, you 4 still have a problem with all of those?

5 MR. MARTINEZ: As it's drafted now, yes,
6 it's a categorical problem. If you're concerned and 7 your question has been repeated to everyone who's 8 talked about donor privacy, the real worry there is 9 that you're just an arm of a party, and I think the 10 current rules already would allow for enforcement of 11 that. If it's some sort of major amount of funding, 12 certainly, it has to be much more than 50 percent, but 13 if there's some way that there's control over the 14 promoted amicus, at that point, it's an issue. When 15 you come up to, like, something dealing with 16 earmarking or not earmarking, the problem has been 17 proven in campaign finance law knowing what qualifies 18 as earmarking has gone back and forth in the D.C.
19 Circuit and it has been heavily litigated by the FEC.

20 MR. HARTNETT: Thank you.

21 CHAIR EID: All right. Anyone else? I see 22 no further questions. Thank you so much for your 23 testimony today.

24 MR. MARTINEZ: Thank you for having me.

25 CHAIR EID: All right. Now we're going to 1 Sharon McGowan.

2 MS. MCGOWAN: Thank you so much, Your Honor,
3 and thank you to the Committee. My name is Sharon 4 McGowan, and I am the Chief Executive Officer of 5 Public Justice, a nonprofit and nonpartisan legal 6 advocacy organization founded in 1982 that focuses, 7 among other things, on preserving access to justice
8 for civil litigants. While we provide direct 9 representation as counsel in many of our cases, we 10 also regularly file amicus briefs in the federal 11 courts of appeals. We greatly appreciate this 12 opportunity to comment on the proposed amendments.

13 We asked to speak today specifically to urge 14 the Committee to reconsider its proposal to require 15 motions for leave to file all non-governmental amicus 16 briefs, and I would just say that, you know, the 17 current package of proposed amendments to FRAP 29 seem 18 to have connected the consent and motion requirement 19 to the Committee's concerns about disclosure and 20 recusals, but we believe that these issues can and 21 should be decoupled. Specifically, requiring motions 22 for leave to file, regardless of consent, at the 23 initial merits stage is not necessary to prevent 24 recusal, may prematurely eliminate helpful briefing, 25 and undermines larger efforts by the courts to promote

1 cooperation and instead may promote additional and 2 unnecessary litigation.

3 First, Public Justice understands that the 4 Committee is concerned with amicus briefs forcing 5 recusal, but the existing amicus rule addresses that 6 concern. Existing Rule 29(a)(2) permits a court of 7 appeals to strike an amicus brief at any time if it 8 would result in a judge's disqualification. In other 9 words, it is already true that amicus briefs need not 10 force recusal regardless of whether the brief was 11 filed on consent or contingent on a motion. Also, all 12 of the information that points to whether recusal is 13 proper is contained in the brief itself. The motion 14 provides no additional information relevant to 15 recusal. Moreover, motions for leave to file amicus 16 briefs are often filed and ruled on well before the 17 panel hearing the merits is assigned, too soon to know 18 whether a brief, if accepted, would force recusal.

19 Second, the Committee expressed that motions 20 may be useful as a tool to screen out unhelpful or 21 duplicative amicus briefs. I know a number of folks 22 have talked about that today prior to my testimony, 23 but let me just reiterate, you know, that because 24 motions for leave to file amicus briefs are often 25 considered well before the panel hearing the merits is

1 assigned and are frequently decided by the clerk or 2 motions panel, they are unlikely, and by "they," I 3 mean the motion requirement, these motions are 4 unlikely to further that goal either.

5 As such, members of the court that are in 6 the best position to determine whether an amicus brief 7 is likely to be helpful, namely, the panel that will 8 be considering the case on the merits, are often not 9 those deciding whether to grant motions for leave to 10 file amicus briefs. As a result, truly useful amicus 11 briefs may be screened out before any member of the 12 court has an opportunity to understand the breadth of 13 the merits, and unhelpful amicus briefs may be 14 permitted to proceed. Motions for leave are simply 15 not an effective screening tool. And so let me just 16 offer our own experience here at Public Justice which 17 illustrates these points.

18 In one case, we filed a motion for leave to 19 file an amicus brief in the Eighth Circuit which was 20 opposed on the basis that our brief would be generally 21 duplicative of a party's briefing. Just one day after 22 briefing on the motion was complete but before the 23 completion of merits briefing and well before the 24 assignment of a merits panel, the motion was granted.

25 In another case in the Tenth Circuit, we

1 filed an opposed motion for leave to file a brief in 2 support of neither party, meaning that it was filed 3 before the appellee had even submitted its brief.
4 That was provisionally granted one day after the 5 motion briefing was complete. That motion was decided 6 by a two-judge motions panel that had no overlap with 7 the merits panel.

8 And in a Sixth Circuit case, we filed a 9 motion for leave after one of the parties declined to 10 consent, but the party then did not go on to file an 11 opposition and the clerk granted the motion.

12 In all of these cases, our being forced to 13 file a motion merely resulted in our request being 14 added to the workload of the motions panel or clerk
15 when the merits panel would have been far better 16 positioned to determine whether our brief was helpful 17 to its consideration of the merits. In fact, in the 18 Sixth Circuit example that I mentioned, the merits
19 panel affirmatively stated during argument that it 20 found our brief helpful in deciding the case.

21 But, even putting aside the question of who 22 would rule on such a motion for leave, whether a 23 motions panel or the merits panel, no denying or 24 granting of additional motions is needed for the 25 merits panel to decide which briefs are valuable and

1       should be given careful consideration and which should 2       be disregarded. The panel simply can do so without 3       the parties having to litigate and the court having to 4       decide whether they should be permitted to file their 5       brief in the first place.

6               As the Committee's well aware, this is now
7       the practice of the Supreme Court. It permits all 8       amicus briefs to be filed without consent or motion 9       and considers their contents if they are useful and 10      ignores them if they are not, and that brings me to my 11      third and final point, which I know some of the other 12      witnesses have touched on today. At a time when the 13      courts are trying to promote cooperation and 14      consultation among counsel to decrease litigation 15      expense, delay, and strain on judicial resources, this 16      amendment tacks in the opposite direction.

17             Requiring these additional motions does not 18      produce any clear benefit. It will not solve recusal 19      concerns and is not an effective means of screening 20      for utility to the court. All it will do is require 21      more litigation time and expense, and, moreover, 22      imposing this requirement of motion potentially opens 23      the door for substantially more and unwarranted 24      opposition to the filing of amicus briefs, which would 25      also demand more of the courts' time not only with

1       respect to deciding whether to accept the brief at all 2       but also in refereeing the attendant request for 3       extension of time and other disputes that motion 4       practice can sometimes manifest.

5               And so, on this point specifically, I just 6       want to urge this Committee to not adopt a rule 7       requiring a motion, and I just want to make sure that 8       I emphasize that a number of the comments of other 9       witnesses are very much consistent with our experience 10      and, as you've seen, the broad range of different 11      groups with whom we are often not aligned on 12      substantive matters, but I think we all can generally 13      speak to, you know, the culture of consent, the desire 14      to sort of let the court have the benefit of these 15      arguments.

16             But also, to the point that Ms. Cain and Mr.
17      Berry made, we often are trying to make sure that we 18      are offering something of unique value and expertise 19      to the court and will join forces with other 20      organizations to make sure that we are not necessarily 21      engaging in duplicative efforts because, you know, 22      that is effective advocacy, and so, you know, I think 23      it is important to not only sort of recognize that 24      there is not really a problem in this regard that's in 25      need of solution, but putting this rule in place, Mr.

1 Carter Phillips recognized, you know, does also create 2 a question of, you know, if we're overpolicing 3 duplication, then what does that look like, and does 4 it really contribute to a race to the courthouse.

5 And that, in many ways, we think would be 6 completely counterproductive to what amicus practice
7 is designed to accomplish, which is truly to be a 8 friend and a helper to the court in deciding the 9 important issues that are being decided in the courts
10 of appeals across the country. So we thank you so 11 much for your consideration, and we urge the Committee 12 to decline to require motions for leave to file amicus 13 briefs in all cases.

14 CHAIR EID: Thank you.

15 MS. MCGOWAN: And I welcome your questions.

16 CHAIR EID: Okay. Thank you. Do we have 17 questions? Ah, Professor Huang, please ask your 18 question.

19 MR. HUANG: Thank you, Judge. Can you hear 20 me okay?

21 CHAIR EID: Yes.

22 MS. MCGOWAN: Yes.

23 MR. HUANG: Great. Ms. McGowan, thank you
24 very much for your testimony and for the written 25 comments. Are you going as far as -- I mean, would

1 your position be to go as far as to remove the consent
2 requirement altogether?

3 MS. MCGOWAN: We actually think that the 4 Supreme Court rule has worked well in practice, and so 5 we would absolutely be comfortable with a rule in that 6 regard. To the extent we were trying to sort of 7 address the particular sort of proposal that the 8 Committee has put forth, we wanted to make sure to 9 sort of weigh in on that, but in our experience, the 10 Supreme Court rule has worked well, and we certainly 11 would encourage, if this Committee wanted to go back 12 and revisit that, we would be very comfortable under 13 that approach.

14 CHAIR EID: All right. Anyone else? All 15 right. I see no more questions. Thank you so much 16 for your testimony today.

17 MS. MCGOWAN: Thank you so much.

18 CHAIR EID: All right. We're moving on to 19 Patrick Moran.

20 MR. MORAN: Thank you, members of the 21 Committee. My name is Patrick Moran, and I'm a senior 22 attorney with the National Federation of Independent 23 Business, Small Business Legal Center. The NFIB Legal 24 Center is a nonprofit public interest law firm 25 established to provide legal resources and be the

1 voice for small businesses in the nation's courts. It 2 is an affiliate of the National Federation of 3 Independent Business, which is the nation's leading 4 small business association. We are regular amicus
5 filers in federal courts of appeals.

6 Small business owners are not lobbyists and 7 many of them are not lawyers. The outcome of 8 litigation often affects them. Yet, by themselves, 9 your average small business owner can't do much about 10 it, and that's why they depend on the NFIB Legal 11 Center to act as a true friend of the court, helping 12 judges to see how their decisions may affect small 13 businesses. The proposed amendments to Rule 29 will 14 get in the way of that important mission. NFIB 15 opposes the proposed amendments for three reasons:
16 First, they discourage helpful briefs. Second, they 17 are costly. And third, they are needlessly out of 18 step with the Supreme Court rules on the same topic.

19 First, the discouraging of helpful briefs.
20 The proposed helpful and relevant standards will act
21 as an unnecessary barrier to the filing of amicus
22 briefs. After all, what one judge finds helpful 23 another may find unhelpful, and, currently, there's 24 already a remedy for that. A judge can disagree with 25 an amicus brief's arguments and decide that case in a

1 different way. But that's not the end of the story.

2 Even if a judge does not agree with the 3 content of an amicus brief, those briefs can inform 4 the greater legal discussion, including dissenting 5 opinions, Law Review articles, and even arguments in 6 other cases, but under this new standard, the 7 punishment for an argument that is not in line with 8 the decision to come will be perhaps the worst one 9 conceivable -- wasted time, wasted effort, wasted
10 money, and an inability to be on the record -- and it 11 creates a new problem. Amici will only submit a brief 12 if they suspect the judge will agree with its 13 arguments, creating a judicial echo chamber.

14 Second, the cost. In short, filing amicus
15 briefs can be expensive for nonprofits like ours.
16 Small teams of attorneys can't be barred everywhere 17 and often need local counsel. Sometimes we can find 18 it pro bono, but oftentimes we'll need to pay and this 19 can cost thousands of dollars. Even if we draft a 20 brief entirely in house and really only need local 21 counsel for the limited purposes of formatting and 22 filing, it can still cost thousands of dollars.

23 Adding in a motion requirement will drive
24 this price tag up significantly, especially when you 25 consider the content of the motion, which is an

1 argument in itself trying to persuade the judge just 2 to allow the brief, and all this for a brief that may 3 still get tossed out under the relevant and helpful 4 standards. Nonprofits seem to be good stewards of the 5 resources entrusted to us, not taking speculative 6 gambles. The proposed rules are thus creating the 7 very uncertainty they claim to solve and will 8 discourage briefs.

9 Finally, the proposed amendments are 10 completely the opposite of the Supreme Court's amicus 11 rules. As we noted in our comment letter, it would 12 make sense for the courts of appeals to build some 13 levees if they have a flood of amicus briefs that the 14 Supreme Court isn't experiencing. Yet, as the 15 Committee has acknowledged, the Supreme Court receives 16 significantly more briefs than the courts of appeals.
17 Yet, instead of raising barriers for amici, the 18 Supreme Court has gotten rid of the notice and consent 19 requirements. So what problem are the courts of 20 appeals dealing with that the Supreme Court isn't? If 21 the answer is recusal, why change the rules for amici 22 rather than relying on the rules as they are, which 23 already solve the issue?

24 The proposed amendments certainly do not 25 provide a satisfactory answer to these problems.

1 There appears to be no evidence of a problem that 2 would justify such a radical departure from the 3 Supreme Court's approach. If there is a problem, 4 conformity to the Court's approach can solve it. The 5 proposed amendments will result in less-developed 6 records, intimidated amici, wasted resources, and 7 uncertainty. The Committee has stated clearly that it
8 wants to eliminate confusion. I encourage you to live 9 up to that standard by adopting a rule consistent with 10 the Supreme Court's rules so that there is one clear 11 standard for amicus briefs, not two opposing ones.

12 Thank you for your time. I welcome any 13 questions from the Committee.

14 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any 15 questions? Lisa Wright.

16 MS. WRIGHT: Hi. Thanks for your testimony.
17 When you were saying the concern about discouraging 18 helpful briefs and perhaps only submitting briefs if 19 expecting the court would agree with the position, I 20 mean, are you suggesting that you would fear that 21 judges would reject the filing of an amicus brief or 22 an amicus brief because they would disagree with the 23 position you're putting forth or --

24 MR. MORAN: Yeah, I mean, that's certainly 25 it.

1 MS. WRIGHT: -- what's the reason that they 2 would deny it? What are you contemplating they would 3 be?

4 MR. MORAN: Right. So I think it kind of 5 echoes the concerns that some of the previous speakers 6 brought up, right? It's like there's a problem first 7 that it could be content-based. I mean, is it? Will 8 it not? We don't really know at this point. But the 9 major concern, I think, is that there's a question of 10 duplication, and that can be very broad and very 11 unclear, right? So, if two filers have, let's say, a 12 similar point or a similar angle, which, you know, a 13 lot of times amici can coordinate with each other but 14 not always. We don't always know who's filing, you 15 know, and oftentimes it's a pile of briefs on the same 16 day that get filed, so it can be difficult to know 17 who's filing what on what topic, and if there's 18 overlap, does that mean that a brief automatically 19 gets struck? I mean, that raises a real problem for 20 us resource-wise, so we have to consider that.

21 MS. WRIGHT: Thank you.

22 CHAIR EID: And anyone else? I see no other 23 questions, so thank you for your testimony.

24 MR. MORAN: Thank you.

25 CHAIR EID: And it was contemplated we take

1 a break now, but we're so far ahead. We're just going 2 to go ahead to the next person, Jaime Santos.

3 MS. SANTOS: Hi, Judge Eid. It's Jaime
4 Santos, but it is spelled like Jaime Santos.

5 CHAIR EID: Oh, okay.

6 MS. SANTOS: In the spirit of appellate
7 practice, may it please the Committee. I'm Jaime 8 Santos, and I'm the Co-Chair of the Supreme Court and 9 Appellate Practice at Goodwin Proctor, but I do want 10 to be clear that my testimony today isn't being 11 offered on behalf of my firm or any of my clients, and 12 it doesn't reflect their views and might even 13 contradict them. Instead, I'm just testifying in my 14 own capacity as someone with a particularly nerdy 15 interest in appellate rules and also someone who's 16 filed dozens of amicus briefs at basically every level 17 of the federal court system, and I'm planning to focus 18 my comments today on the practical implications of the 19 proposed amendments.

20 I'll start with the proposed amendment to 21 Rule 29(a)(2) which newly defines the purpose of a 22 permissible amicus brief. In my view, the appropriate 23 purpose of an amicus brief is to provide information 24 to a court. It might be legal, factual, historical, 25 or contextual that can aid in judicial decision-

1 making. I think the proposed amendment to Rule
2 29(a)(2) goes awry by suggesting that an amicus brief
3 can only be helpful if it discusses a matter mentioned 4 by the parties or by other amici or if it's not 5 mentioned by the parties or other amici, and I don't 6 think that's right for a couple reasons.

7 First, and I think particularly focusing on 8 the kind of disfavoring duplicative points, I think 9 the same basic point in a brief can be framed in 10 different ways, or it can be accompanied by different 11 examples or different analogies that might resonate 12 more powerfully with one judge or another and it can 13 still help the court reach informed conclusions, and I 14 think that's especially true where non-parties and 15 their lawyers might have more on-the-ground experience 16 with the matter and they can explain the issues in 17 ways that might be more digestible or persuasive than 18 some of the parties or their lawyers.

19 Second, I think that the notion that 20 redundancy among briefs isn't helpful is fundamentally 21 wrong. I think there are many cases in which the 22 sheer breadth of and quantity of non-parties that are 23 willing to get involved as amici can itself offer 24 important context to courts, so a pharmaceutical 25 company saying in its merits brief the rule the other

1 side is asking you to adopt will have disastrous
2 consequences for patients might be compelling or it 3 might not given the party's financial interest in 4 winning.

5 But three amicus briefs by patient groups,
6 physician groups, and insurers who are willing to go 7 to the trouble to retain counsel to say no, really, 8 this will completely mangle the way we operate, that 9 can be enormously helpful and powerful and relevant 10 despite being duplicative of something a party says.
11 And, of course, redundancy can sometimes be unhelpful, 12 but, if that's the case, courts can ignore unhelpfully 13 redundant information in amicus briefs just like they 14 ignore unhelpfully redundant information in party 15 briefs every day.

16 Next, I'd like to address the proposed 17 motion for leave requirement. I too strongly urge the 18 Committee to reject this proposed amendment, and if 19 anything, I urge the Committee to adopt the Supreme 20 Court's opposite approach. I have the rare experience 21 of having filed dozens of amicus briefs in district 22 court and in the court of appeals and, as you know, 23 courts of appeals don't currently require motions for 24 leave when there's consent, and parties typically 25 don't withhold consent because doing so violates what

1 I think of as FRAP 101, don't be a jerk.

2 But, in district court, where motions for 3 leave have to be filed even with consent, lawyers and 4 parties for some reason cannot help themselves in my 5 experience. For the district court amicus briefs I
6 filed, and, again, I filed dozens in district court, 7 the party that's not supported by the brief has filed 8 an opposition almost without exception, and they often 9 make pretty ridiculous arguments in lengthy 10 oppositions that distract from the substantive issues 11 in the case.

12 In my view, the proposed motion for leave 13 requirement will just lead to more work for under-14 resourced and overworked courts. Judges typically 15 have to read a proposed amicus brief to see if leave 16 to file is warranted, and your brain can't really 17 unread a brief that's already read, so the leave 18 requirement serves very little purpose from a judicial 19 decision-making perspective aside from forcing courts 20 to read not only amicus briefs themselves but also 21 motions for leave, oppositions, and replies.

22 Moreover, amicus briefs are often written 23 pro bono or at deeply discounted rates. Adding motion 24 practice in every case will only increase the amount 25 of uncompensated work required by lawyers like myself,

1 and if an interested non-party goes through all the 2 trouble to hire a lawyer to prepare an amicus brief or 3 if a lawyer spends dozens and dozens of hours writing 4 an amicus brief pro bono only for a court to deny 5 leave even with consent, it's an extraordinary waste 6 of resources, not to mention demoralizing to those of 7 us who serve as officers of the court and are doing 8 our level best to offer information to aid judges in 9 making decisions. And, again, courts already have a 10 very powerful tool to deal with unhelpful briefs.
11 They can simply ignore them when reaching a decision.

12 Finally, I wanted to offer three quick 13 points regarding the proposed new detail disclosure 14 rules, which I urge the Committee to reject. First, 15 appellate litigators like myself frequently represent 16 many small organizations that band together to offer
17 their viewpoint in cases of public importance, and I 18 think that would be all but impossible under these 19 disclosure rules, and the vast amount of space the 20 proposed disclosures will take up for each 21 organization will mean less room that we have to 22 provide substantive information that could be helpful 23 to the court.

24 Second, technical compliance with the 25 disclosure rule might be easy for regular players like

1 the ACLU or the Cato Institute, but for organizations 2 that file less frequently and may not have detailed 3 revenue, donation, and funding information at their 4 immediate disposal, I think the proposed disclosure 5 rules will make it impossible for them to lend their 6 perspective, especially on the tight timelines in 7 which amicus briefs are usually prepared. So, as a 8 practical matter, I think the proposed rules will 9 simply mean fewer helpful perspectives being offered.

10 And, third, all of us who testified today
11 are basically serving as amici to the Rules Committee.
12 None of us was required to provide the disclosures 13 proposed in the Rule 29, and yet the Committee seems 14 completely capable of evaluating our comments on their 15 merits, and, surely, the members of the federal 16 appellate courts can do the same. Thank you.

17 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any 18 questions? I don't --

19 MS. SANTOS: I was just -- oh, sorry.

20 CHAIR EID: Oh, go ahead.

21 MS. SANTOS: I was just going to say there
22 was one question asked of Ms. Baird from DRI earlier 23 that I think I might be able to provide a helpful 24 answer to, and if I promise I won't violate proposed 25 Rule 29(a)(2) by being duplicative, could I offer a

1 response?

2 CHAIR EID: Yeah, please do.

3 MS. SANTOS: Okay. Thank you. So Ms. Baird
4 was asked something along the lines of the following.
5 I think she was asked, if it's true that amici don't 6 file redundant briefs, then why are you worried about 7 oppositions being filed? Because, if there's no good 8 grounds to oppose, then parties won't file 9 oppositions.

10 So, in my experience, parties have offered a 11 whole range of non-compelling reasons for opposing 12 amicus briefs, and I'll just give a few examples.

13 So, if the amicus briefs address an issue 14 mentioned by a party, oppositions argue that they're 15 improperly duplicative. If amicus briefs address an 16 issue not mentioned by a party, oppositions argue that 17 they're improperly novel. If a party's well-18 represented by experienced counsel, then oppositions 19 argue that there's no need for amicus advocacy. And 20 if a party is not well-represented by experienced 21 counsel, oppositions argue that amicus briefs can't 22 fill gaps that are left by party counsel.

23 I've seen oppositions argue that amicus 24 briefs are just kind of altogether inappropriate at 25 the trial court level, as if trial court judges are

1        somehow unsuited to evaluate legal or contextual 2        arguments, which I just think is wrong. I think our 3        trial court judges do important and hard work every 4        day.

5                    And I've also seen amicus briefs that just 6        throw potshots at the lawyers filing grace on behalf 7        of clients, saying things like that lawyer once 8        represented one of the parties in a different case, so 9        this is clear collusion. I remember a couple briefs 10       that accused me of being a mercenary on behalf of an 11       amicus I represented, which, to be honest, I found a 12       little bit amusing after I got over being offended.

13                   So I guess, in my experience generally and 14       also specifically in the context of filing amicus
15       briefs in district courts, the fact that there's no 16       compelling reason to oppose a motion does not stop 17       parties or lawyers from filing an opposition. I think 18       sometimes lawyers just can't help themselves, and 19       sometimes party clients actually direct the filing of 20       an opposition, which ethics rules would require 21       lawyers to do if they can't convince their clients 22       that it's a waste of time or money. I just think that 23       all of these points distract from the substantive 24       issues before a court.

25                   CHAIR EID: Thank you. Anyone else?

1 Professor Hartnett.

2 MR. HARTNETT: Yes, two questions. One is 3 I'd like to hear a little bit more about the concern 4 that there may be certain amicus filers who don't have 5 sufficient records to comply with the 25 percent 6 requirement. I guess I'm just sort of skeptical that 7 somebody wouldn't be able to tell fairly readily if a 8 party to the case has provided that much of their 9 revenue. And my second question is, can we treat what 10 you said about FRAP 101 as a suggestion for a new 11 rule?

12 MS. SANTOS: So I guess, to the second 13 point, I would say I would be happy to see that in the 14 rules. I feel like it's a governing principle that I 15 try to use in my own life every day, but I do think 16 that kind of the role the Supreme Court adopts, which 17 is let's just let the parties get -- let's just let 18 everyone express their views, is probably the right 19 one.

20 But, as to the other question, so let me
21 give you an example. So, in the Affordable Care Act 22 case, well, one of the many Affordable Care Act cases 23 that was before the Supreme Court, I think it was 24 called California versus Texas, but I don't know that 25 that is all that helpful as a case title. So I filed

1 a brief on behalf of, I think, 80 different
2 organizations that all kind of banded together to talk 3 about the rights, you know, women's rights 4 essentially, and how the ACA, if validated, would 5 deeply impact women, particularly in marginalized 6 communities and in health deserts.

7 I think, as I think about it now, this is 8 not the best example because, presumably, California 9 and Texas didn't provide material financial support to 10 any of these organizations, but pretend that these 11 involved corporations or they involved public interest 12 organizations that provide kind of mini grant funding 13 to smaller organizations.

14 The way that the kind of amicus-wrangling
15 process works is that we would work on a brief maybe 16 with one or two organizations, and then we would talk 17 to a whole bunch of organizations that say, you know, 18 this is what this brief says, I completely agree with 19 it. It resonates with my experience, and I want to be 20 part of it because I want to show the court that this 21 isn't just one off organization feeling this way.
22 This is 150 religious congregations across the United 23 States or, you know, a hundred women's rights 24 organizations feeling similarly.

25 And so, when all of this happens in a pretty

1 short time frame, it can just be a couple of days 2 even, for organizations that don't have a kind of 3 large established financial and legal kind of 4 department, trying to sort through okay, wait, let's 5 make sure, you know, did anyone that's affiliated with 6 a party or that's on the board of a party contribute 7 money last year? I think that could actually be 8 really, really difficult, especially for a lot of 9 these smaller organizations, and I know that funding 10 really varies often, and it is also incredibly common 11 for parties now in lawsuits to be themselves industry 12 groups, to be numerous -- you could have intervenors.

13 So I just think that for small organizations 14 it actually could be really difficult, and I think 15 that having to get sign-off and having to get 16 confirmation is more likely to just have parties not 17 join those briefs, which I think would be a downside 18 to the courts.

19 MR. HARTNETT: Can I just follow that up? I
20 mean, I certainly understand that at a low enough 21 percentage, but I guess I'm having a hard time 22 imagining any, you know, small organization that 23 you've mentioned there, you know, some local religious 24 organization, some women's health organization, who 25 wouldn't be able to tell you off the top of their head

1 somebody who gave them 25 percent of their revenue.

2 MS. SANTOS: You may be right, Professor,
3 but, I mean, I guess I think that some organizations, 4 they have really varying kind of funding from year to 5 year, and sometimes a particular contribution from -- 6 and, again, I think micro grants are really common, 7 especially with small business organizations or civil 8 rights organizations, and so it may well be that -- or 9 even like kind of local chapters, things like that.

10 If you don't have a kind of consistent 11 stream of funding that's the same all the time, if it 12 varies and you might get a large donation -- I 13 remember during in 2021, early 2021, there was this 14 mass infusion of funding into civil rights nonprofits 15 to try to battle some of the -- to challenge some of 16 the federal actions of the new administration in 2021, 17 and so that, I think, that type of thing is not 18 infrequent and it really can create a kind of enormous 19 recordkeeping issue.

20 And many of those organizations that are 21 really getting involved in trying to make sure to 22 vindicate the rights of individuals in the United 23 States might not have the infrastructure to kind of, 24 like, track all of that stuff, and the time it takes 25 even just to kind of verify for a lawyer like me to

1 feel confident making a representation in a brief to a 2 court, I just think it could be difficult to happen on 3 the type of timeline that some of this litigation 4 involves, especially when you think about how much 5 litigation now involves emergency dockets, motions to 6 stay, and extremely expedited proceedings.

7 MR. HARTNETT: Thank you.

8 CHAIR EID: All right. Anyone else?

9 (No response.)

10 MS. SANTOS: Thank you, your Honor.

11 CHAIR EID: Thank you. All right. We will 12 move to Stephen Skardon.

13 MR. SKARDON: Good afternoon. My name is 14 Stephen Skardon and I'm an Assistant Vice President, 15 Insurance Counsel, at the American Property Casualty
16 Insurance Association, or APCIA. On behalf of APCIA, 17 I want to thank the Committee for the opportunity to 18 participate in today's hearing. As set forth in our 19 January 10, 2025, comment letter, APCIA strongly 20 opposes the Committee's proposal to amend Rule 21 29(a)(2) to eliminate the option of filing an amicus 22 brief on consent.

23 By way of background, APCIA, a registered 24 501(c)(6) tax-exempt organization, is the primary 25 national trade association for home, auto, and

1 business insurers. APCIA's member companies represent 2 65 percent of the U.S. property casualty insurance 3 market and write more than 673 billion in premiums
4 annually. APCIA files amicus briefs in significant 5 cases before state and federal courts. Amicus filings
6 allow APCIA to share its broad national perspective 7 with the judiciary on matters that shape and develop 8 the law.

9           Since 2020, APCIA has filed more than 80 10 amicus briefs in federal courts, including in each of 11 the 12 U.S. courts of appeals and the United States 12 Supreme Court. Drawing on the experience of its 13 member companies, APCIA offers a unique perspective 14 and considerable expertise to assist the court in 15 resolving reserved questions. APCIA's perspective can 16 be particularly helpful in federal courts given 17 insurance matters are primarily litigated in and the 18 business of insurance is largely regulated at the 19 state level.

20           Federal courts have repeatedly recognized 21 the critical role amici like APCIA play in addressing 22 public policy issues concerning the insurance market.
23 Indeed, in recent years, multiple federal courts of 24 appeals have invited APCIA as amicus counsel to 25 participate in oral arguments. The Committee's

1 proposal to eliminate the option to file an amicus
2 brief on consent threatens to limit the valuable role 3 amici play. The proposed amendment would deprive 4 federal courts of appeals of critical context, 5 insight, and analysis. Moreover, it would have 6 adverse consequences for the public as federal courts 7 would have less access to information regarding the 8 potential public policy consequences of their 9 decisions.

10 In its May 13, 2024, memorandum to the 11 Committee, the Advisory Committee on Appellate Rules
12 asserted that the unconstrained filing of amicus
13 briefs in courts of appeals would produce recusal
14 issues and that consent is not a meaningful constraint 15 on amicus briefs because the norm among counsel is to 16 uniformly consent without seeing the amicus brief.

17 The Advisory Committee did not cite any 18 studies or research to support either claim. Instead, 19 they supported the assertions by referring to 20 Committee on Code of Conduct Advisory Opinion Number 21 63, which is titled Disqualification Based on Interest
22 in Amicus That Is a Corporation. Advisory Opinion 23 Number 63 applies to amicus briefs filed by 24 corporations in which a judge or certain family 25 members have a "financial interest." It does not

1 apply to tax-exempt organizations like APCIA and for 2 good reason. Tax-exempt organizations like APCIA and 3 others that have testified today do not present the 4 type of financial or other conflicts contemplated in 5 Advisory Opinion Number 63 or Federal Rule of 6 Appellate Procedure 26.1 that would require recusal.

7           Nevertheless, organizations like APCIA stand
8 to see their amicus activities significantly curtailed
9 by the proposed amendment. The proposed amendment 10 also presents an unnecessary, unworkable, subjective 11 standard to assess which amicus briefs would be 12 helpful to or disfavored by the court. The draft 13 Committee notes explain that the proposed amendment 14 seeks to prevent the filing of unhelpful briefs, which 15 are those that fail to bring to the court's attention 16 relevant matter not already mentioned by the parties.
17 As Ms. Cain mentioned earlier in her testimony, it's 18 unclear whether "mentioned as used in the proposed 19 amendment" means a passing reference in a party's 20 brief or something more substantive.

21           The lack of a clear standard that can be 22 easily and uniformly applied across circuits, coupled 23 with the presumption that amicus briefs are 24 disfavored, will result in fewer amicus briefs being 25 filed. This would be detrimental to federal courts of 1 appeals and the public. Rather than unnecessarily

2 amend the rule and create an unworkable subjective
3 standard, the Committee should leave the rule 4 unchanged and allow courts of appeals judges or their 5 clerks to do what they have always done: determine 6 for themselves which amicus briefs are helpful.

7 APCA again thanks the Committee for the 8 opportunity to participate in today's hearing.

9 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any 10 questions? I do not see any, so thank you for your 11 testimony.

12 All right. We will move to Zack Smith.

13 MR. SMITH: Good afternoon. Thank you for 14 the opportunity to testify today. My name is Zack
15 Smith, and I currently serve as a Senior Legal Fellow 16 and the Manager of the Supreme Court and Appellate 17 Advocacy Program at The Heritage Foundation.

18 Like my colleague, I urge you to withdraw 19 the proposed amendments to Federal Rule of Appellate 20 Procedure 29. Fundamentally, these proposed changes, 21 particularly the ones related to donor disclosures, 22 are a solution in search of a problem, and this 23 troubling fact becomes even more apparent when you
24 consider how this entire effort to amend Rule 29 25 began. Decrying recent judicial decisions with which

1 they disagreed, Democratic Senator Sheldon Whitehouse
2 from Rhode island and Democratic Representative Hank
3 Johnson from Georgia have insinuated, without proof, 4 that these decisions were influenced by amicus curiae
5 who, entangled in clandestine networks of dark money, 6 are engaged in sinister efforts to manipulate the 7 federal judiciary.

8           The solution, they argue, is onerous donor 9 disclosure and reporting requirements that expose many 10 details of an amicus's associations. But let's be 11 clear. Their proposals do not spring from a pure-12 hearted concern for good government and the 13 judiciary's integrity. Instead, they're part of a 14 broader partisan effort to undermine public confidence 15 in the courts and to harm their perceived political 16 enemies, and because of these obvious partisan
17 politics at play, Whitehouse's and Johnson's ideas
18 have gained little traction in the halls of Congress, 19 so they've turned elsewhere and they're now asking the 20 Judicial Conference of the United States, the 21 governing body of the federal judiciary, to do their 22 dirty work for them and to enact via a rule change 23 what they could not get Congress to enact.

24           I urge you, don't fall for their trap. This 25 is particularly important because the proposed

1 changes, as others have mentioned, requiring onerous 2 donor disclosure information likely run afoul of the 3 First Amendment. The Supreme Court most recently
4 addressed First Amendment concerns regarding compelled 5 disclosures in Americans for Prosperity versus Bonta.
6 In that decision, Chief Justice Roberts, writing for 7 the majority, explained that each governmental demand 8 for disclosure brings with it an additional risk of 9 chill, and because of that risk, courts apply exacting 10 scrutiny when evaluating whether such demands for 11 disclosure violate the First Amendment.

12 The Court clarified in Bonta that while 13 exacting scrutiny does not require that disclosure 14 regimes be the least restrictive means of achieving 15 their ends, it does require that they be narrowly 16 tailored to the government's asserted interest. It's 17 not quite strict scrutiny, but it's close. As the 18 Court has repeatedly stressed in the First Amendment 19 context, that matters, and even though the government 20 might have an interest in some disclosures from amicus 21 filers, those interests, as my colleague addressed, 22 are adequately served by the current regime
23 implemented by Appellate Rule of Procedure 29.

24 The lack of need for enhanced disclosures, 25 the arbitrary limits for disclosure in the new

1 proposed regime, and the resulting lack of fit between 2 any governmental interest and the proposed disclosures
3 all counsel against them as violating the First 4 Amendment. The Advisory Committee's campaign finance 5 analogy is inopposite. As several Senators opposed to 6 these changes have explained in their comments, courts 7 are not Congress, litigation is not an election, and 8 an appellate docket is not a free-for-all, meaning 9 that the justifications for campaign finance 10 disclosures do not apply here.

11 And even if we step away from the tiers of 12 scrutiny analysis, it's clear, as Justice Clarence 13 Thomas has explained, that the text and history of the 14 Assembly Clause suggests that the right to assemble 15 includes the right to associate anonymously.

16 On a related and, in my mind, more troubling 17 note, the Committee, in explaining its rationale for 18 adopting these proposed amendments, explicitly 19 rejected "the perspective that the only thing that 20 matters in an amicus brief is the persuasiveness of 21 the arguments in that brief, so that information about 22 the amicus is irrelevant." The Committee then 23 emphasized that again, I have a direct quote, that 24 "the identity of the amicus does matter at least in 25 some cases to some judges."

1           Think about that for a moment. Essentially,
2           the Committee is justifying constitutionally suspect 3           disclosure rules on the basis that some judges might 4           care more about who is supporting certain positions 5           than they care about the merits of the arguments being 6           made. If that's true, it's shameful and it's a 7           rejection of the idea that Lady Justice wears a 8           blindfold.

9           For all of these reasons, I urge the 10          Committee to reject the proposed donor disclosure 11          changes to Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 29. I 12          appreciate the opportunity to testify before you 13          today, and I welcome any questions the Committee might 14          have.

15          CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any
16          questions? Professor Hartnett.

17          MR. HARTNETT: Yes. You've heard this 18          question before, and that is -- I want to make sure -- 19          I mean, I think I understand your position, but I want 20          to be sure that I do.

21          MR. SMITH: Sure.

22          MR. HARTNETT: That is that your objection
23          to revealing financial relations, financial ties 24          between a party and an amicus, is such that you would 25          object to requiring disclosure if a party provided 100

1 percent of the funds to an amicus.

2 MR. SMITH: Yes, as drafted, and more to the 3 point, Professor, look, I'm not sure throughout the 4 Committee's study of this matter there's been an 5 identified purpose, and as I mentioned in my testimony
6 and as Seth and I mentioned in our written submission 7 as well, given this lack of a clarified governmental 8 interest, it's hard to see how these proposed changes 9 could pass the exacting scrutiny test to make sure 10 that they are indeed -- the Committee's proposals are 11 indeed narrowly tailored to achieve the government's 12 goal because, frankly, I'm not sure that the 13 compelling governmental interest has been clearly 14 articulated throughout this process.

15 MR. HARTNETT: Can I ask you on a different 16 note, given the way you've articulated the idea that 17 judges might care about the identity of an amicus in 18 some cases --

19 MR. SMITH: Sure.

20 MR. HARTNETT: -- am I right then that you
21 reject the argument that we just heard from the prior 22 witness that it properly does make a difference when, 23 for example, as we just heard, that an argument made 24 by an interested party, an actual party to the case, 25 that if the court were to accept their argument, it

1 would create real problems, say, for patient health
2 throughout the nation, that that argument is supported 3 by amicus filers representing lots of patients and 4 lots of doctors? Is it inappropriate then for a court
5 to consider, in your view, the fact that those amicus
6 filers were representing doctors and patients?

7 MR. SMITH: Well, I think that the question
8 may be slightly different. I think the issue may be 9 slightly different at least as framed by the 10 Committee. Yes, certainly, I think, if a healthcare 11 company or a doctor is filing on issues related to 12 medical care or how certain changes or interpretations 13 to a statute may be dealing with Medicare payments or 14 Medicaid payments, certainly, that could be relevant.
15 I think it goes to the point my colleague, Seth Lucas, 16 was making as well that, certainly, I think courts and 17 judges may appropriately view certain filers, use it 18 as a shorthand for the quality of briefs.

19 If you know certain repeat filers regularly
20 provide helpful information to the courts, yes, I
21 think that's something that is common practice and I 22 doubt anyone would have an objection to. I think the 23 perception at least that's been given by the 24 Committee's comments is that judges may care more 25 about who is filing certain comments without weighing

1 the merits of their arguments. For instance, I don't 2 think it will come as a surprise to anyone on this 3 Committee that unpopular parties, who likely many of 4 us would disagree with their substantive views on 5 certain issues, often make pretty compelling First 6 Amendment arguments to the courts, and I think the 7 concern would be there at least that the perception
8 from what the Committee is saying is that the court
9 may not weigh those valid First Amendment arguments 10 simply because of who is presenting them, and that is 11 inappropriate.

12 CHAIR EID: Okay. Lisa Wright.

13 MS. WRIGHT: Yes. Hi. I guess my question
14 is that, you know, under the current rule that doesn't 15 require some of the disclosures that would be required 16 under the new proposal, there's been a lot of examples 17 in recent years of that information that hasn't been 18 disclosed becoming public through research and the 19 press articles, et cetera, that the public does end up 20 learning this information and it becomes -- they learn 21 that, in fact, briefs were filed that had various, you 22 know, funding and other connections with parties and 23 other amicus, and I'm wondering if the judiciary you 24 think should be concerned that that reflects on them
25 in a way that undermines public trust when the public

1 does learn that the case was decided based on briefing 2 that had these undisclosed connections, so it's not as 3 if, you know, if you believe that that does reflect 4 poorly or is something the courts should be concerned 5 about, the judiciary --

6 MR. SMITH: Sure, and I --

7 MS. WRIGHT: -- needs to be concerned about.

8 MR. SMITH: Sure, and I appreciate the 9 question. If there are specific examples that you're 10 thinking of, I would certainly appreciate hearing them 11 because, at least in the research that Seth and I did, 12 we did not find that to be the case. There was one 13 instance we mentioned in our legal memorandum which we 14 submitted for comment involving Oracle and Google in 15 that case where there was some research about the same 16 donor had donated to multiple parties.

17 But, other than that one limited example, we 18 did not come across this as being a widespread 19 practice or a widespread problem, and, in fact, that 20 was the only example that we found where that was even 21 raised as a potential issue. And so, at least this 22 perception that this has been a widespread problem or 23 that there are multiple examples where issues like 24 this have come to the forefront, at least as far as I 25 know, that has not been the case.

1 MS. WRIGHT: Thank you.

2 MR. SMITH: Sure.

3 CHAIR EID: All right. Anyone else?

4 (No response.)

5 CHAIR EID: Okay. Thank you for your 6 testimony.

7 MR. SMITH: Thank you very much.

8 CHAIR EID: We will now turn to Gerson
9 Smoger.

10 (No response.)

11 CHAIR EID: Maybe not. Can we turn to Tad
12 Thomas? Thank you.

13 MR. THOMAS: Hi. Good afternoon. Thank 14 you.

15 CHAIR EID: Good afternoon.

16 MR. THOMAS: Thank you for providing an 17 opportunity for public comment on the proposed 18 amendments to Rule 29. My name is Tad Thomas. I am a 19 past president of the American Association for 20 Justice, and I'm the current Chair of AAJ's Legal 21 Affairs Committee, which oversees our Amicus Curiae 22 program as well as its positions on rules amendments.

23 AAJ is the world's largest plaintiff trial 24 bar association whose core mission is to protect the 25 Seventh Amendment right to trial by jury. As a

1 practicing trial lawyer, I appreciate the role that 2 amicus briefs play in educating the court regarding 3 critical legal issues. In addition to my testimony
4 today, AAJ has filed a public comment.

5 I would also like to point out, as was 6 pointed out earlier, that rarely do the plaintiff and 7 defense bars align on issues involving rules 8 amendments, and I think it's important for the 9 Committee to note, at least on the issue of party 10 consent today, you see quite a bit of alignment on the 11 proposed rule changes, and I would ask the Committee 12 to take note of that.

13 Also, briefly, I would like to say that AAJ
14 supports the proposed amendment's goal for increased 15 transparency and strongly believes that the true 16 identity of the amici should be easy to determine by 17 the courts, the parties, and the public.

18 We agree with the previous speaker, Mr.
19 Aronson from Court Accountability, on the issue of 20 transparency, and I will point out, as having led our 21 association, I don't believe that the 25 percent rule 22 is a problem at all. I would also point out that in 23 many cases, given the tax status of these 24 organizations, they're actually required to keep 25 detailed documentation of who is donating to them, so

1 I believe that that's a little bit of a red herring.
2 We definitely believe that amici should not hide 3 behind sham identities with names that don't 4 accurately represent their core beliefs or their 5 intentions.

6 Our main concern as an organization, though, 7 is with Section (a)(2) of the proposed amendments, the 8 removal of the party consent provision, as has been 9 discussed quite often today. We would ask that there 10 be substantial revision to this section. Last year, 11 AAJ filed 10 out of our 11 federal circuit court 12 briefs through party consent. However, we also 13 believe, if party consent is not permitted and 14 permission for leave to file from the court is the 15 only option, it will increase the burden on the courts 16 and lead to unnecessary motions practice.

17 One of your speakers earlier said that it's 18 typically the trial lawyers who object to the consent.
19 You know, trial lawyers don't understand the culture
20 of consent, but I'd like to cite to you an experience
21 that AAJ had in the Eleventh Circuit in Williams
22 versus D'Argent Trust, et al. Defense counsel
23 withheld consent to our amicus brief filing. We filed
24 a motion for leave of court. We detailed AAJ's 25 identity, the purpose of our brief, and the defense

1 counsel responded by filing an opposition to that 2 motion, arguing that AAJ should be denied leave 3 because, in their opinion, our filing did nothing new 4 or added nothing new to the briefing.

5 The defense in that case went so far as to 6 list all of the authorities that AAJ and the plaintiff 7 appellees mutually relied upon in an attempt to 8 demonstrate the duplicative nature of the amicus
9 brief. While we were wrongly accused of regurgitating 10 arguments made by the plaintiff appellees, our brief 11 provided a much broader perspective on the common law 12 of contracts than what was found in the parties' 13 briefs. Simply put, the courts would not be aided if 14 the Federal Rules prohibited amici and the parties 15 from citing the same case law or from providing a 16 broader perspective on legal issues at hand. Indeed, 17 the amici may even disagree about what the same case 18 means.

19 The defense opposition also wrongfully 20 claimed that Rule 29 prohibited AAJ from filing an 21 amicus brief because counsel for the plaintiff 22 appellees were dues-paying members of our association.
23 We filed a reply rebutting those arguments, citing 24 this Committee's 2010 advisory note explicitly 25 excluding general membership dues from those funds

1 intended to fund preparation or submission of an 2 amicus brief. The court granted AAJ's motion three 3 weeks later.

4 If an appellate court really does not want 5 to spend time reading a brief, it doesn't have to even 6 with party consent, but requiring court permission 7 will create additional work for the courts, requiring 8 them to read and consider the contents of briefs, and 9 our experience in the Eleventh Circuit reflects that.
10 You know, we would encourage the Committee to adopt 11 the same rule as the Supreme Court and allow all 12 briefs. However, if they choose not to do that, we 13 would suggest going back to the consent provision as 14 originally written.

15 I would also like to add that we recommend 16 removing or simplifying the proposed purpose section 17 as we also believe it leads to unintended 18 consequences. The purpose section essentially places 19 a value judgment on certain types of briefs, with the 20 first sentence favoring relevant matter not mentioned 21 by the parties and a second sentence disfavoring 22 redundancy, and we question how the courts might 23 accomplish these goals without reading the briefs and 24 determining which briefs should be filed.

25 In a rule with a laudable goal of 1 transparency, we fear that the purpose section could 2 promote favoritism for certain well-known amici at the 3 expense of lesser-known or resource-strapped ones.

4 Additionally, the purpose section would be hard to 5 execute in practice. Even with some coordination, 6 amici will not always know who is preparing a brief 7 and what issues their brief will cover. Will there be 8 a race to the courthouse, with the first amici seeking 9 permission to receive approval possibly denying the 10 court the opportunity to read a better-crafted brief 11 from a renowned legal scholar on the same topic? Or 12 will the court wait until all briefs have been 13 submitted, review for redundancy and uniqueness, and 14 only accept a few?

15 Under the first scenario, the court may be 16 deprived of helpful legal augmentation. In the second 17 scenario, the courts have expended time and the 18 parties have expended both time and resources on a 19 brief that may not even be considered. With that, 20 I'll turn it over for questions. Thank you.

21 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any
22 questions? I do not see any, so thank you for your 23 testimony.

24 MR. THOMAS: Professor Hartnett.

25 CHAIR EID: Oh, oh, oh, Professor Hartnett.

1           MR. HARTNETT: Yeah. You know, you got a
2 law professor here. I got to keep asking questions.
3 With regard to your concerns about the purpose 4 section, how much of that concern is tied to the 5 elimination of the consent option? Now that is the 6 proposed rule has some differences but is pretty 7 similar to the existing Supreme Court rule and we 8 haven't heard anybody complain about that, so I wonder 9 if you would be as concerned with the purpose if it 10 weren't linked to the elimination of the consent 11 option?

12           MR. THOMAS: I would agree, Professor, they 13 are linked, and I think, if you remove the consent 14 issue, that section becomes less of a problem.

15           MR. HARTNETT: And one other thing, I just 16 want to thank you in particular for calling attention 17 to the comments submitted by the California Academy of 18 Appellate Lawyers. I mean, obviously, we would see it 19 anyway, but having that flagged for us, I think, was 20 very helpful as an alternative way of dealing with the 21 recusal issue, so thank you for flagging that.

22           MR. THOMAS: No problem. Thank you, 23 Professor.

24           CHAIR EID: All right. Anyone else?

25           (No response.)

1 MR. THOMAS: Thank you all.

2 CHAIR EID: Thank you.

3 Okay. We're going to go back to Gerson
4 Smoger.

5 (No response.)

6 CHAIR EID: All right. I guess we'll go to 7 Larissa Whittingham.

8 MS. WHITTINGHAM: Hello. Good afternoon,
9 and thank you for the opportunity to testify. My 10 name's Larissa Whittingham, and I work as Litigation 11 Counsel for the Retail Litigation Center. The RLC is 12 a nonprofit trade association that files approximately 13 20 amicus briefs per year in federal and state courts.
14 I am here today to testify about Rule 29(a).

15 First, the Retail Litigation Center opposes 16 the proposal to remove the right to file amicus brief 17 upon consent of the parties. Rule 29 already contains 18 safeguards to address the Committee's concerns.

19 The May 13 report of the Advisory Committee 20 identifies the potential for recusal as a reason to 21 amend Rule 29. As Ms. McGowan from Public Justice
22 rightly pointed out earlier, the existing Rule 29 23 addresses this concern, saying a court of appeals may 24 strike an amicus brief that would result in a judge's 25 disqualification. The May 13 report notes a

1 particular problem. Specifically, "The clerk's office
2 does a comprehensive conflict check, and if an amicus 3 brief is filed during the briefing period with the 4 consent of the parties, it could cause the recusal of 5 a judge at the panel stage without the judge even 6 knowing."

7           While the RLC does not dispute this could be 8 a problem, it is a problem caused by processes or 9 configurable computer systems, not by rules. The 10 solution to that problem should be to update systems 11 to allow a judge to exercise the rights already 12 provided by the existing Rule 29, striking a brief 13 that would result in that judge's recusal. So, as an 14 alternative to limiting potential panelists, a 15 computer system could generate an alert to a judge who 16 may have had a conflict with an already-filed amicus 17 brief if that judge is selected for the panel, and the 18 court could then decide whether to strike that brief 19 before relying on it.

20           In short, the remedy to the recusal problem 21 the report noted is to appropriately configure systems 22 and processes to allow the implementation of existing 23 Rule 29, not by amending the rule. The only other 24 reason identified in the May report for going the 25 direction of restricting briefs rather than making the 1 ability to file more liberal, as the U.S. Supreme 2 Court did, is that the requirement amicus briefs be 3 filed at the Supreme Court as booklet operates "as a 4 modest filter on amicus briefs." In other words, the 5 Committee appears concerned about the number of amicus

6 briefs filed in the circuit courts.

7           However, as has been pointed out today,
8 amicus briefs filed in the Supreme Court far outnumber 9 the amicus briefs filed in the circuit courts. Cases 10 that attract multiple briefs do so because of the 11 weight and import of the legal issues before the 12 court. Thus, amicus briefs from multiple parties or 13 non-parties thus help the court understand the breadth 14 of the law affected by the issues.

15           Second, the Retail Litigation Center opposes 16 the proposal to create a standard in the rules for 17 which briefs are favored or disfavored, particularly 18 when paired with the motion requirement, which would 19 promote unnecessary adversarialness. When amicus
20 briefs are opposed, judges are already able to use 21 their discretion and familiarity with a particular 22 case to make a decision in that set of circumstances.
23 If a standard were to be added, the criteria 24 identified in these proposed amendments do not 25 sufficiently encompass the many ways in which amicus

1       briefs may help a court and could harmfully impact the 2       filing of helpful briefs.

3               Specifically, the proposed amendments add 4       these two sentences: "An amicus curiae brief that 5       brings to the court's attention relevant matter not 6       already mentioned by the parties may help the court.
7       An amicus brief that does not serve this purpose or 8       that is redundant with another brief is disfavored."
9       Initially, the purpose intent that the Committee 10      proposes to add to Rule 29(a)(2) fails to recognize 11      the many ways in which an amicus brief may be helpful 12      to a court.

13              I recognize what has been mentioned today
14      that Supreme Court Rule 37 possesses a preference 15      similar to this one. However, the pairing of this 16      standard with the increased likelihood of contested 17      motions if the full proposed Rule 29 amendments went 18      forward would encourage litigation over the scope of 19      the standard, and the plain text of the proposed 20      purpose is too limited. The only thing said to help 21      the court in the proposed purpose section is 22      discussing relevant matter not already mentioned by 23      the parties. That is certainly one way that an amicus 24      brief may be helpful but far from the only way.

25              Amicus briefs may also provide examples of 1 real-life applications of how the issues discussed by 2 the party would apply beyond that case and give more 3 sophisticated data into the impact of matters raised 4 by the parties but not discussed thoroughly in party 5 briefing. And amicus briefs from experts such as 6 those with technical expertise or professors may 7 provide added depth or history to matters raised by 8 but not exhausted in party briefing.

9 As Ms. Cain and Mr. Skardon both said
10 earlier, the standard of relevant matter not already 11 mentioned by the parties could be read too narrowly 12 once adjudicated, and particularly with a motion 13 requirement, this standard will almost certainly be 14 adjudicated. In support of that claim, I echo the 15 experience Ms. Santos shared earlier, which is that 16 amicus briefs RLC has filed in district courts without 17 the consent exception are routinely opposed instead of 18 following the civility tradition of consent in 19 appellate courts.

20 That said, Profession Hartnett, to the 21 questions you've asked a few of whether the purpose
22 sentence would be problematic without the motion 23 requirement, I do think it still would be. I think 24 it's worth rescinding that purpose statement. I 25 recognize it's in the Supreme Court rule, but

1 particularly in the circuit courts, where appellate 2 courts are ruling on such a large type of cases, many 3 with technical natures, there is a variety of purposes 4 beyond just the ones identified, and while briefs are 5 allowed by consent, to the point a few people have 6 raised today, not every brief is consented to, and I
7 hope this is not the case, but the culture of civility 8 is not guaranteed, and to the extent that briefs are 9 opposed, a court should be able to use its own 10 discretion without having to pinpoint a particular 11 standard. So the RLC would request removing that 12 purpose sentence even if the motion requirement is -- 13 even if the consent is kept in or, at the minimum, 14 expanding the scope of purpose.

15           Next, the proposal to disfavor amicus briefs
16 that are redundant with other briefs would be 17 especially detrimental to smaller organizations with 18 important voices and would also be difficult to 19 administer. The RLC filed 12 briefs in federal courts 20 in 2024. In over half of those cases, the RLC joined 21 one or more other associations. When amici can work 22 together to provide a single helpful voice to the 23 court, they often do so. But, in some cases, multiple 24 briefs are necessary to offer unique perspectives and 25 expertise.

1           In those cases, while the legal argument or 2           factual application may be a common one and thus 3           something a court may, on quick review, deem as 4           redundant, the differing analysis may prove extremely 5           useful when a court begins to write an opinion and 6           assess the impact of the panel's legal conclusion on 7           various scenarios. A clear example of this is impact 8           of legal conclusions on highly technical facts, such 9           as evolving technology, where multiple technical 10          amicus briefs may prove extremely beneficial to a 11          court when deciding what words to use when precisely 12          articulating a rule without unknowingly and 13          unwittingly expanding its reach.

14                 In conclusion, the Retail Litigation Center
15          encourages the Rules Committee to reject the proposed 16          amendments to Rule 29(a). Thank you for the 17          opportunity to testify.

18                 CHAIR EID: Thank you. All right. Do we 19          have any questions? We see one question, but it's an 20          unidentified person. Is there a question there? No.

21                 All right. Anyone else? Professor Huang.

22                 MR. HUANG: Ms. Whittingham, thank you for 23          your testimony, and welcome back to being questioned.
24          You mentioned at a couple points that there were other 25          purposes, especially at the appeals level, the circuit

1 level, for amicus briefs. If you had some examples in 2 mind of what some of those sort of, I guess, external 3 purposes might be, please feel free to spell it out.

4 MS. WHITTINGHAM: Yeah, absolutely, and some 5 of this goes back to how a court, if they're forced to 6 apply the standard of relevant matter raised by other 7 parties, how deeply they look into that relevant 8 matter. I think there's a lot of examples of industry 9 groups like the Retail Litigation Center being able to 10 provide very specific data on the retail industry or, 11 for example, a brief we filed in the Ninth Circuit in 12 a case around session replay code. We were able to 13 provide additional context into what session replay 14 code is, how retailers use it, some of the technology.
15 We have professors write briefs with that kind of 16 theme.

17 All of those issues were raised similarly by 18 the parties. They had to explain what session replay 19 code is. They had to talk a little bit about the 20 issues and data and how it affects -- maybe they don't 21 have to talk about how it affects an industry, but 22 have to raise the concept, but then we can dive deeper 23 as an industry or a professor can dive deeper into the 24 history, and so I think it's worked at the Supreme 25 Court because there's a general understanding that

1 that's going to happen, but when litigated, if a court
2 has to look at the plain text and say, well, it's a 3 relevant matter, it was raised by other parties, then 4 it could exclude a lot of briefs. Thank you for the 5 question.

6 CHAIR EID: Okay. Anyone else? Okay. I
7 don't see anyone. Thank you.

8 All right. We're going to turn to Kirsten 9 Wolfford.

10 MR. HARTNETT: Judge? Judge, there's 11 somebody I can't identify with a hand raised. I'm not 12 sure who that is.

13 CHAIR EID: Yeah, I called on that person 14 before.

15 MR. HARTNETT: Oh, okay.

16 CHAIR EID: I don't know who it is.

17 MR. HARTNETT: Okay. Same person. Never 18 mind. Okay.

19 CHAIR EID: Yeah, I don't know. I think 20 we'll go ahead.

21 MS. WOLFFORD: Hello. Thank you. Thank you 22 so much. My name is Kirsten Wolfford on behalf of the 23 American Council of Life Insurers, ACLI. Thank you 24 for the opportunity to provide testimony today and 25 expand upon our written submitted comments.

1           Rule 29 should remain as written in our 2 opinion without the proposed amendments for three 3 reasons. First, the proposed amendments would provide 4 unnecessary burdens that could provide a chilling
5 effect on amicus briefs. Second, amicus briefs
6 provide a unique perspective that cannot always be 7 replicated by parties in a matter. And, third, the 8 benefit of amicus briefs to the courts in case
9 outcomes cannot be overstated. Any changes to Rule 29
10 that hinder or discourage the filing of amicus briefs
11 should be avoided and this amendment should not pass 12 forward.

13           I acknowledge that many parties today have 14 provided testimony and agree with many of those 15 assertions and, therefore, will keep my remarks brief.
16 First, the proposed amendment, among other things, 17 would eliminate the option to file an amicus brief by 18 consent. As many have stated, this does not allow for 19 situations where parties prefer to consent, saving 20 time and resources of the court and all parties 21 involved. Additionally, the proposed amendment would 22 require specified statements of interest in the motion 23 and the brief and assurances to the content of the 24 brief. These provisions add extra cost to those 25 wishing to file amicus briefs with no obvious benefit,

1 as so many people have pointed out today. The result
2 of these changes would be less amicus briefs filed, 3 which brings me to my second point.

4 Amicus briefs provide a unique perspective
5 that cannot always be replicated by parties in a 6 matter. The value of these briefs are significant and 7 should not be hindered by amendments which do not 8 serve an overly beneficial purpose. For example, ACLI 9 typically submits three to five amicus briefs a year 10 in federal courts which provide a rich background for 11 the courts to consider in matters involving the life 12 insurance industry.

13 ACLI in its usual practice gathers and 14 analyzes data, confers with employees of life
15 insurers, monitors product development, consumer 16 trends, and works with policymakers in crafting laws, 17 regulations, and administrative information. This 18 wealth of knowledge is a product of dedicated years of 19 advocacy in this space and is invaluable to consider 20 in these matters concerning the industry and those 21 products.

22 Lastly, ACLI is just one example of an area 23 that is complex and could be difficult for a party to 24 capture in a matter allowing the court the opportunity 25 to receive this crucial information and weigh the

1 impact an outcome would have on consumers and 2 stakeholders. These outcomes often are very 3 widespread and could impact many of these consumers in 4 ways that the courts might not imagine if they did not 5 have the benefit of this sort of amicus brief 6 background.

7 Parties have limits in their own brief
8 writing and typically do not have the luxury of 9 expanding into these types of explanations, and amicus 10 briefs can supply this context at no cost to the 11 court. Creating hurdles for this type of brief would 12 significantly hinder this important resource to the 13 court in making important decisions. Overall, the 14 protections which these amendments seek to address 15 would create an unintended result which would harm 16 future outcomes and important matters, and for these 17 reasons, we ask that the amendments to Rule 29 not 18 pass forward and Rule 29 remain as it is today. Thank 19 you for your time and happy to take any questions.

20 CHAIR EID: All right. Do we have any 21 questions? I do not see any, so thank you so much for 22 your testimony.

23 MS. WOLFFORD: Thank you.

24 CHAIR EID: All right. We are going to go
25 back to Gerson Smoger. You need to unmute. You need

1 to unmute. I think we'll just pause for a moment and 2 see if we can take care of any technical difficulties
3 we might be having. There we go. We can hear you.

4 MR. SMOGER: This is why I went into law and 5 not engineering.

6 CHAIR EID: Please proceed.

7 MR. SMOGER: So I'm now on my third 8 computer. So it's a pleasure to be able to talk to 9 this panel. My name is Gerson Smoger, and I'm at 10 Smoger & Associates. I come to you somewhat 11 differently than the others. I write maybe four to 12 six amicus briefs a year. I do them all pro bono.
13 I've never been paid for any of them and I would never 14 take any money. I choose the projects that I want to 15 get involved for a large number of organizations and 16 groups, but that gives me a lot of experience in 17 knowing that the purpose is -- and I think we're not 18 talking about generally the underlying purpose of the 19 amicus briefs.

20 The outside parties don't control who comes 21 up in a case and which case goes up because most of my 22 work is either in the appellate courts, in circuit
23 courts, or the Supreme Court, not the district court, 24 and not knowing who's going to be there, often you 25 find that there can be counsel that just don't raise

1 the arguments that are necessary to be raised, and you 2 see that by experience because sometimes they're 3 first-time people that are just getting to the court 4 and never been there before, so there are arguments 5 that aren't given.

6 There's also issues that come up where the 7 record in appellate courts is fairly early, so you've 8 got a motion to dismiss granted but nothing -- there's 9 no record of the case or what the underlying facts 10 are. Would that affect other things? And then, 11 finally, there are cases that have larger implications
12 both legally or factually outside of the cases before 13 the court so that amicus briefs alert the court. Now, 14 in my testimony about the courts' positions, I am in 15 favor and I do not oppose limitations and I'll get 16 into these generally on the court.

17 There are two things that we're trying to 18 do. One is disclosure of information so the courts are 19 as informed as possible --

20 AUTOMATED VOICE: It's 1:00.

21 MR. SMOGER: -- as to who's coming before 22 them and what information is there. I support the 23 disclosure. I don't support things that would -- 24 items that might limit the ability for courts to hear 25 it all, and I think Sharon McGowan had a point that

1 the court itself doesn't -- that the motions panel or 2 other panels hear or the clerks hear whether an amicus
3 brief should go forward, and I think that the court 4 should have the benefit of amicus brief, and I would 5 oppose the restrictions.

6 Now nobody has talked about the 6500-word
7 limit. I support it, though I've struggled to meet 8 it, but I think that a clear word limit rather than 9 the way the rule was written before is beneficial and 10 absolutely clear. I also support -- there's language 11 in 23(a)(4)(I) which sets a concise description of the 12 identity and it goes into what should be in there. I 13 can tell you that every brief I've ever filed has 14 followed those even though they weren't expressly 15 written, and there's no reason not to include them.

16 As to concerns about redundancy, I would say 17 the record before this -- the record now before the 18 Federal Rules evidences that. If the record is 19 replete with multiple redundant comments, that I think 20 one of the comments takes from a paragraph that I 21 wrote in my submission, and now you will hear that 22 multiple times in other comments, it is what happens.
23 There is a redundancy problem, but are we curing that?
24 I think everybody -- I think most people, they request 25 for leave of court. I don't see that that's helpful

1 or necessary. The way it really works now, for the 2 most part, it is experienced appellate counsel give 3 leave. Inexperienced don't.

4 When inexperienced don't, the leave is 5 granted, but it's a lot of work to file that motion 6 because the motions come at the end. You have to have 7 your -- it has to come after your brief's already 8 written because the leave test is showing the brief, 9 and now you're asking for extra work. From my 10 position as pro bono, it's like why need that work?
11 Why restrict the ability of the actual panel to hear 12 it?

13 Now the only reason I've seen that's been 14 given as to why this is helpful is for recusal of 15 judges, and, I mean, let's be factual. 29(a)(2)
16 allows the judge to say this brief can't be submitted 17 because it would cause recusal, but who is going to 18 write a motion and highlight bases for recusal if 19 surreptitiously they wanted it to occur in their 20 motion? It's not going to happen, so it doesn't 21 really help what we want, and there's already the 22 power to give the recusal later.

23 The other question is on the questions of 24 redundancy which are, I think, dealt with one of 25 giving that power. I don't think it's helpful or

1 necessary to give the power to require everybody to 2 file a motion, and I think there's a lot of reasons
3 everybody has given that, and I don't think anybody 4 has supported it, so I won't go further on that in the 5 comments. The other comments are the two comments
6 about what the court should disfavor, and that's not a 7 rule. It's just saying here's what we should and 8 shouldn't do.

9 I disagree with some of the other amici.
10 Seven days after the merits brief, you can scrub your 11 brief. You can look at them. If you're absolutely 12 having a point that's totally redundant, and I have 13 because I want my briefs to be read and I know if the 14 briefs that I'm spending all this time writing just 15 are copycat briefs, then the clerks and the judges 16 aren't going to read it. They're going to see that 17 and push it aside. So I think you make a point of 18 saying here's what's new. If you have to reference 19 what's in the other brief, you've got them seven days 20 after and you just say as stated by the other party on 21 page 23 and then go on to say but they didn't include 22 X, Y, and Z. That's easily done.

23 The other thing is like redundant but --

24 CHAIR EID: Excuse me. You're at five 25 minutes already.

1 MR. SMOGER: Okay.

2 CHAIR EID: So can you wrap it up?

3 MR. SMOGER: Okay. I will wrap it up with 4 that I support the 25 percent rule. I actually think 5 it should be 10 percent. I don't know where 25
6 percent comes in. If the SEC makes a party disclose 7 to give information to the public at 10 percent, 8 that's fine. And in response to a question, I'm on 9 multiple -- I've been involved for a long time in 10 boards and multiple boards and multiple organizations, 11 and you always know who gave 25 percent and you always 12 know 10. Everybody's struggling for money. People do 13 always know who's given at least 10 percent because 14 then they're coming back to them, and 25 percent, 15 frankly, is ridiculous because people absolutely know 16 that, and to say otherwise just doesn't talk about the 17 realities of running any type of organization or any 18 type of nonprofit.

19 CHAIR EID: Thank you. Do we have any 20 questions? All right. I don't see any questions, so 21 thank you for your testimony.

22 MR. SMOGER: Thank you for your time, and 23 I'm sorry for the delay and my technical problems.

24 CHAIR EID: No worries.

25 MR. SMOGER: Thank you.

1           CHAIR EID: All right. We've come to the 2 end of our agenda, so I'm going to pause here to see 3 if anyone else has a comment, a question. This is 4 your last moment to speak.

5           (No response.)

6           CHAIR EID: Nobody? All right then. I want 7 to thank all the Committee members, the witnesses, and 8 the observers for attending our hearing today, and we 9 are done. Thank you.

10           (Whereupon, at 1:07 p.m., the hearing in the 11 above-entitled matter was adjourned.)
