

03-AP-105

DEBEVOISE & PLIMPTON LLP

919 Third Avenue
New York, NY 10022
Tel 212 909 6000
Fax 212 909 6836
www.debevoise.com

Date January 14, 2004
To Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure
Attn Peter G. McCabe, Secretary
Fax 202-502-1755
Tel
From Daniel B. Levin
Tel (212) 909-6537

Facsimile
11 pages including cover page

Comments to proposed Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1

04 JAN 14 AM 9:36

For assistance or confirmation please call 212 909 6407

This message is intended only for the use of the individual or entity to which it is addressed and may contain information that is privileged, confidential and exempt from disclosure. If the reader of this message is not the intended recipient or an employee or agent responsible for delivering the message to the intended recipient, you are hereby notified that any dissemination, distribution, or copying of this communication is strictly prohibited. If you have received this communication in error, please notify us immediately by telephone and return the original message to us by mail. Thank you.

January 14, 2004

Peter G. McCabe, Secretary
Committee on Rules of Practice and Procedure
Administrative Office of the United States Courts
One Columbus Circle, N.E.
Washington, D.C. 20544
Fax: (202) 502-1755

Re: Proposed F.R.A.P 32.1

Dear Mr. McCabe:

I write to oppose proposed Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1, which would allow citation of unpublished opinions in the United States courts of appeals.

I served as a law clerk to Judge William A. Fletcher on the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in 2002-2003, and am now an associate at Debevoise & Plimpton LLP in New York. I will clerk for Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg on the United States Supreme Court during the October 2004 Term. This letter reflects only my own views, not those of my past, present, or future employers. I have previously written about the practice of using unpublished opinions in the courts of appeals, and I enclose a copy of that comment, which appears at Daniel B. Levin, Fairness and Precedent, 110 Yale L.J. 1295 (2001).

Allowing citation to unpublished opinions will uniquely and unfairly disadvantage poor litigants and those with low-value litigation. The proposed rule will increase the number of citable appellate opinions from recent years more than threefold. Unlike law review articles, newspaper columns, Shakespeare sonnets, or even district court opinions, unpublished opinions are a court of appeals' own words. Even if unpublished opinions remain formally nonprecedential, dutiful attorneys will feel compelled to search and absorb this body of opinions before making a submission to the court. This added layer of research will increase the cost of appellate litigation, harming poor litigants, while providing little benefit.

The Committee's comments to the proposed rule note the availability of unpublished opinions on Lexis and Westlaw and on court websites and conclude that because of this widespread availability, "[b]arring citation to 'unpublished' opinions is no longer necessary to level the playing field." The problem, however, is not simply one of availability, although that is part of it. Commercial services such as Lexis and Westlaw are easily searchable, but these services are expensive, with the cost of a single search often exceeding $100. Unpublished opinions are also generally available for free on circuit court websites, but these sites lack the sophisticated search capabilities of the costly commercial services. Even if a lawyer could easily and cheaply locate relevant unpublished opinions, simply reading, analyzing, and absorbing the material takes time and adds cost to litigation. Rich litigants will always be able to invest more in research, but the proposed rule change would further and unnecessarily tip the balance in their favor.

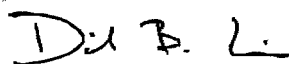

Based on my observation during my time as a law clerk, the proposed rule would have little practical benefit. In the Ninth Circuit, unpublished opinions, although they vary in length, generally contain enough explanation to reassure the parties that the court seriously considered their case. An unpublished opinion need not describe the facts of the case in any detail, because the parties presumably know their own facts, but the opinion will present the court's legal conclusions. In my experience, a judge, working with a law clerk, might spend weeks or months preparing a single published opinion. On the other hand, because unpublished opinions address only a limited audience, all the unpublished opinions from a week's worth of cases can be prepared, circulated among the judges on the panel, and issued within a week or two of the sitting.

If the court knows that its audience extends beyond the parties, the present form of unpublished opinion will not survive. Setting out legal conclusions without first explaining the factual context makes sense when the readers are already intimately familiar with the facts, but free-floating statements about the law are unhelpful and potentially harmful to a broader audience: unhelpful because a reader without easy access to the facts of a case will have a hard time using an unpublished opinion in a useful way, and potentially harmful because if a party does cite to an unpublished opinion a diligent opposing party, or the court itself, might find itself in a position of having to retrieve the original briefs or other underlying materials in the case just to make sense of the unpublished opinion.

As others have explained, a likely result of the proposed rule will be that courts stop writing anything other than "affirmed" or occasionally "reversed" in unpublished opinions. This result would deprive many parties of an explanation, however short, that they would otherwise receive of how the court reached its decision in their appeal.

I encourage the Committee to reject the proposed Federal Rule of Appellate Procedure 32.1.

Sincerely,

Daniel B. Levin

enclosure

1 of 1 DOCUMENT

Copyright (c) 2001 Yale Law Journal Company
Yale Law Journal

May, 2001

110 Yale L.J. 1295

LENGTH: 3766 words

CASE NOTE: Fairness and Precedent Anastasoff v. United States, 223 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.), vacated on other grounds, 235 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2000).

- Daniel B. Levin

SUMMARY:

... Although precedent plays a crucial institutional role in the judicial system, the Anastasoff rule, by unleashing a flood of new precedent, will disproportionately disadvantage litigants with the fewest resources. ... Another Eighth Circuit panel had rejected precisely the same argument in Christie v. United States, an earlier unpublished opinion. ... In that essay, Arnold acknowledges that tremendous caseload pressure has driven the unpublished opinion movement, but he cites a number of detrimental effects of the practice. ... Finally, the unpublished opinion rule creates a vast body of "underground law" accessible to the public at a reasonable cost, but the very judges who produce the opinions then disavow them by limiting their precedential value. ... Before addressing the reasons to support limiting the precedential value of unpublished opinions, it is important to remember that precedent plays a vital role in the judicial system. ... First, adhering to precedent, by treating like cases alike, makes the judicial system more fair or just. ... The benefits precedent brings to the judicial system, in terms of predictability, stability, and fairness in adjudication, are distributed among all participants in the system. Likewise, the marginal benefit of the Anastasoff rule would be distributed among all participants in the judicial system. ...

TEXT:

[*1295]

In Anastasoff v. United States, n1 the Eighth Circuit invalidated a court rule that prevents litigants from citing unpublished opinions as precedent. More than three-quarters of cases resolved on the merits in the federal courts of appeals result in unpublished opinions n2 and have limited precedential effect. Although precedent plays a crucial institutional role in the judicial system, the Anastasoff rule, by unleashing a flood of new precedent, will disproportionately disadvantage litigants with the fewest resources. Because even important institutional concerns should give way when they impinge on individuals' rights to fair treatment, courts should not abandon the practice of limiting the precedential effect of unpublished opinions.

I

Faye Anastasoff paid income taxes on April 15, 1993. On April 13, 1996, she mailed in a refund claim for overpayment of her 1993 income taxes. The IRS received her claim on April 16, 1996, three years and one day after the original payment, and one day late. Anastasoff argued before the Eighth Circuit that the mailbox rule saved the claim. Another Eighth Circuit panel had rejected precisely the same argument in Christie v. United States, n3 an earlier unpublished opinion. But rather than distinguish Christie, Anastasoff simply told the court it was not bound by the holding because, under Eighth Circuit Rule 28A(i), unpublished opinions do not count as binding precedent. n4

110 Yale L.J. 1295, *

In a sweeping opinion, the court declared itself bound by Christie and held that Rule 28A(i) unconstitutionally exceeded the boundaries of Article [*1296] III by allowing the court to avoid the precedential effect of its own decisions. Writing for the unanimous panel, Judge Richard Arnold explained that a declaration and interpretation of general principles of law is "inherent in every judicial decision." n5 This declaration is authoritative and must be applied in subsequent cases. These principles underlay the Framers' conception of judicial power, and, according to Arnold, they limit the power delegated to the courts by Article III. n6

Arnold briefly addressed and dismissed the practical ramifications of the ruling. First, Arnold emphasized that not all opinions need be published, but they must all carry precedential weight. Second, Arnold rejected the argument that the high volume of appeals faced by the court renders ascribing precedential effect to all decisions unrealistic. Rather, Arnold stated that the remedy should be simply "to create enough judgeships to handle the volume," or to allow a larger backlog of cases. n7

On December 18, 2000, the Eighth Circuit, sitting en banc, vacated the holding in Anastasoff. n8 The court held that the tax issue became moot when the government decided to pay Anastasoff's claim and declared its acquiescence to the interpretation of the tax statute announced by the Second Circuit in Weisbert v. United States, n9 which was in direct conflict with Christie. Noting that courts decide cases, not issues, the court held that "the constitutionality of that portion of Rule 28A(i) which says that unpublished opinions have no precedential effect remains an open question in this Circuit." n10

II

Although the Anastasoff holding was short-lived, the case raises a vital issue. Unpublished opinions are a relatively recent phenomenon in the federal courts. The Judicial Conference resolved only in 1964 to give the courts of appeals discretion whether to publish opinions. n11 The movement toward limited publication did not pick up until the early 1970s, when the Federal Judicial Center disseminated a set of recommended standards for publication. n12 By 1974, all the circuits had some sort of limited publication [*1297] plan. n13 In 1999, the circuit courts disposed of 78.1% of their cases in unpublished opinions. n14 Under the Anastasoff rule, all these cases would carry precedential weight.

Eighth Circuit Rule 28A(i) limits the precedential value of unpublished opinions by barring citation to them. Allowing citation of unpublished opinions will have a tremendous ripple effect for both litigants and judges. Because precedent is worthless without reasoning, n15 judges will need to make their logic and reasoning transparent even in unpublished opinions, increasing the amount of time required to dispose of each case. Litigants with the resources to track down these opinions will have a richer body of precedent from which to draw their arguments, putting them at a systematic advantage over litigants with fewer resources.

Although the Anastasoff court grounded its reasoning in principles of originalism, Judge Arnold gave an earlier clue to his motivations in a piece published one year before his court handed down Anastasoff. In that essay, Arnold acknowledges that tremendous caseload pressure has driven the unpublished opinion movement, but he cites a number of detrimental effects of the practice. n16 First, unpublished opinions may allow judges to reach decisions without bothering to justify them. n17 Second, many cases "with obvious legal importance" are decided by unpublished opinions. n18 Finally, the unpublished opinion rule creates a vast body of "underground law" accessible to the public at a reasonable cost, n19 but the very judges who [*1298] produce the opinions then disavow them by limiting their precedential value. n20

III

Anastasoff would have opened the floodgates to a vast new body of precedent in federal courts. Yet the court failed to consider any principled justification for a no-precedent rule. There is more to the argument for no-precedent rules than simply judicial efficiency. While precedent protects important institutional concerns of the justice system, too much of a good thing may pose a danger. The question is not whether precedent is good, but what the optimal amount of precedent is. Abolishing noncitation rules for unpublished opinions would systematically and unfairly disadvantage individual litigants with limited resources (including pro se and public-interest litigants and public defenders) by making it harder for them to present their cases.

The Anastasoff court held the Eighth Circuit's noncitation rule unconstitutional. If the Constitution clearly mandates that all opinions, published or not, must carry precedential value, then there is no room for debate. But as several commentators have pointed out, responsible historical inquiry could lead to different conclusions about the Framers' intent. n21 By emphasizing a constitutional finding, the court may have been attempting to preempt debate over the merits of the no-precedent rule. But as long as proponents of the rule (or like rules in other circuits) can advance a competing historical claim, the originalist argument will not end the debate.

Although the Anastasoff court based its decision in constitutional interpretation, there is clearly an independent case to be made for all opinions to carry equal precedential weight. As Judge Arnold constructs the argument, the invalidity of Rule 28A(i) flows from the principles that (1) the judicial system rests on precedent, and (2) all cases should be treated equally (that is, there should not be a body of underground law, nor should judges have even the temptation to "punt" on some cases).ⁿ²² Precedent does legitimize judicial decisionmaking. But the Anastasoff court does not evoke any fundamental right of individual litigants that may be violated if courts limit the precedential value of some opinions. As long as litigants continue [*1299] to have the right to cite unpublished opinions to make law-of-the-case, res judicata, or collateral estoppel arguments, noncitation rules will not contravene individual litigants' rights. The notion behind the attack on noncitation rules is that they lead to institutional erosion.

Before addressing the reasons to support limiting the precedential value of unpublished opinions, it is important to remember that precedent plays a vital role in the judicial system. Frederick Schauer suggests three virtues of precedent: fairness (or justice), predictability, and strengthened decisionmaking.ⁿ²³ First, adhering to precedent, by treating like cases alike, makes the judicial system more fair or just. Second, if litigants know ahead of time that judges are bound to follow precedent closely, the system becomes more predictable. And third, by allowing judges to rely on earlier decisions, a precedential system leads to more efficient decisionmaking.ⁿ²⁴ But it is equally important to note that a noncitation rule for unpublished opinions does not mean the abandonment of precedent. It merely says that some cases (in which the result itself should derive from sound precedent) may not themselves be cited as precedent in future cases.

Because the Supreme Court grants certiorari in few cases, the task of constraining appellate judges falls heavily on precedent. But precedent works to constrain judges in two ways: First, judges must base decisions on precedent; and second, when judges know that an opinion will serve as binding precedent in the future, they will presumably pay careful attention to the decision. In the first case, whether a decision carries precedential weight itself should have little bearing. That is, even if an appellate panel decides not to publish an opinion, thereby depriving it of precedential effect, the panel must still rely on precedent to reach its result.ⁿ²⁵

Precedent plays a central role in the judicial system, but banning noncitation rules for unpublished opinions poses not just the obvious threat to efficiency of adjudication, but a threat to the right of litigants to equal concern and respect from their government.ⁿ²⁶ This basic right to individual [*1300] fairness trumps competing institutional claims. That is, if a principle that may promote justice in some systematic way begins to erode individuals' rights in a predictable manner, that principle should then give way to the individual rights concerns. In its application, the Anastasoff rule is likely, in the name of institutional utility, to violate the basic right to fairness of the poorest litigants in the justice system.

The debate is too often cast as one of grand principles of justice on the side of giving all opinions precedential effect versus base economic concerns on the other side.ⁿ²⁷ This juxtaposition is a mistake. Noncitation rules for unpublished opinions not only make the judicial system more efficient, they protect the individual right of litigants, particularly the most disadvantaged litigants, to a measure of fairness in the judicial system. The Anastasoff rule would affect litigants at the bottom of the economic spectrum in two ways: First, it would increase delays in adjudication, delays from which the poorest litigants are likely to suffer the most, and second, it would create a less accessible class of precedents.

The literature on unpublished opinions suggests some of the efficiency concerns that motivated the federal courts to limit publication and adopt no-precedent rules for those opinions.ⁿ²⁸ The high volume of cases makes the production of fully reasoned opinions enormously costly. In order for federal appellate courts to hear and decide all the cases before them, judges require some mechanism for expeditiously disposing of cases that offer no complicated or new legal question. Unpublished opinions serve this purpose.

These seemingly mundane efficiency concerns raised by defenders of noncitation rules, such as Judges Kozinski and Reinhardt,ⁿ²⁹ implicate individual fairness concerns. Giving all cases precedential effect will intensify the caseload pressure on judges and increase delays in adjudication (a fact Judge Arnold is ready to acceptⁿ³⁰). Clogged dockets will not affect all litigants equally. Poor litigants will be less able to weather the inevitable delays than wealthier litigants. For example, tort plaintiffs unable to pay mounting medical bills will suffer especially badly from busier dockets. This will likely push these poorer litigants into less [*1301] advantageous settlements in civil cases.ⁿ³¹ In addition, prisoners bringing habeas claims who rely on the efficient adjudication of their cases will suffer particularly from clogged dockets. While all litigants may take some solace in the system-wide utility that a universal principle of precedent might offer, the costs of implementing this system, in terms of justice delayed, will be felt most strongly by those at the bottom of the economic spectrum. n32

110 Yale L.J. 1295, *

In addition to the problems posed for the poorest litigants by clogged dockets, the Anastasoff rule presents a second problem for these litigants: unequal access to precedent. Limiting the precedential effect of unpublished opinions through noncitation rules ensures that litigants will have equal access to precedent, and thus a fair shot at litigating their cases. n33 Though unpublished opinions are available on commercial databases or through court clerks' offices (and, in four circuits, for free through court websites), n34 finding these precedents, even when they are available for free, requires time, energy, and money, and places those litigants with greater resources at an advantage over those with fewer (including pro se litigants, public defenders, and public-interest litigants). n35 Judge Arnold worries that litigants may be unable to invoke a previous decision of the court as precedent, even if the case is directly on point, because a previous panel has designated the opinion unpublished and therefore uncitable. n36 A full precedent system would avoid this situation. But even if this proverbial [*1302] needle in the haystack were available to litigants, only those with the resources to search for it could benefit from it. By putting impecunious litigants at a systematic disadvantage, throwing the vast opus of unpublished opinions into the body of precedent would violate these individuals' right to equal concern and respect. n37

IV

Anastasoff rests on the proposition that the system would be on the whole more fair or just if all cases counted equally as precedent. The Anastasoff rule, however, would not only threaten the efficiency of judicial administration, it would harm the ability of individuals at the bottom of the economic spectrum to bring their cases. Making all opinions carry full precedential effect will not optimize the amount of precedent. The benefits precedent brings to the judicial system, in terms of predictability, stability, and fairness in adjudication, n38 are distributed among all participants in the system. Likewise, the marginal benefit of the Anastasoff rule would be distributed among all participants in the judicial system. But the costs of the vast increase in precedents are likely to be borne by those litigants on the lowest rungs of the economic ladder. This systematic unfairness to the poorest individuals in the justice system, impinging on their right to present their cases, should prevent courts from mandating that all unpublished opinions carry precedential weight.

FOOTNOTES:

n1. 223 F.3d 898 (8th Cir.), vacated on other grounds, 235 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2000).

n2. In 1999, 78.1% of cases in the U.S. Courts of Appeals were disposed of by unpublished opinions. Statistics Div., Admin. Office of the U.S. Courts, Judicial Business of the United States Courts: 1999 Annual Report of the Director, tbl.S-3 (1999), at <http://www.uscourts.gov/judbus1999/s03sep99.pdf> [hereinafter Judicial Business].

n3. No. 91-2375 MN, 1992 U.S. App. LEXIS 38446 (8th Cir. Mar. 20, 1992) (per curiam) (unpublished opinion).

n4. Anastasoff, 223 F.3d at 899.

n5. 223 F.3d at 899.

n6. Id. at 901.

n7. Id. at 904.

110 Yale L.J. 1295, *

n8. Anastasoff v. United States, 235 F.3d 1054 (8th Cir. 2000) (en banc).

n9. 222 F.3d 93 (2d Cir. 2000).

n10. Anastasoff, 235 F.3d at 1056.

n11. Judicial Conference of the U.S., Reports of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States 11 (1964).

n12. Advisory Council on Appellate Justice, FIC Research Series No. 73-2, Standards for Publication of Judicial Opinions 3 (1973).

n13. Boyce F. Martin, Jr., In Defense of Unpublished Opinions, 60 Ohio St. L.J. 177, 184 (1999). Today every circuit has a rule governing the precedential value of unpublished opinions. Although the rules vary slightly from circuit to circuit, in general the rules prevent parties from citing unpublished dispositions as precedent. Most circuits bar citation to unpublished opinions or orders as precedent, but make an exception for purposes of finding res judicata and collateral estoppel, and determining the law of the case - that is, those instances where the preclusive effect of the disposition, rather than its quality as precedent, is relevant. See 1st Cir. R. 36(b)(2)(F); 4th Cir. R. 36(c); 5th Cir. R. 47.5.3, 47.5.4; 6th Cir. R. 28(g); 7th Cir. R. 53(b)(2)(iv), 53(e); 8th Cir. R. 28A(i); 9th Cir. R. 36-3; 10th Cir. R. 36.3; D.C. Cir. R. 28(c); Fed. Cir. R. 47.6(b). The Second, Third, and Eleventh Circuits also limit the precedential effect of unpublished opinions, but do not make explicit exceptions for preclusive effects. See 2d Cir. R. 0.23 (prohibiting citation to dispositions in open court or by summary order); 3d Cir. R. 28.3(b) (stating that only published opinions are binding on the court); 11th Cir. R. 36-2 (stating that unpublished opinions are not considered binding precedent but may be cited as persuasive authority if the opinion is attached to a brief).

n14. Judicial Business, supra note 2, tbl.S-3.

n15. Rule 28A(i) already made an exception for res judicata, collateral estoppel, and law-of-the-case questions - that is, those questions that turn on the decision itself, not the reasoning behind the decision.

n16. Richard S. Arnold, Unpublished Opinions: A Comment, 1 J. App. Prac. & Process 219, 221-22 (1999).

n17. Id. at 223.

n18. Id. at 224.

n19. Many, but not all, unpublished opinions are available on commercial databases such as Lexis and Westlaw. For instance, Christie, the unpublished opinion that gave rise to the problem in Anastasoff, is available on Lexis but not Westlaw. Christie v. United States, No. 91-2375 MN, 1992 U.S. App. LEXIS 38446 (8th Cir. Mar. 20, 1992) (per curiam) (unpublished opinion).

110 Yale L.J. 1295, *

n20. Arnold, supra note 16, at 225.

n21. Compare Recent Case, Anastasoff v. United States, 223 F.3d 898 (8th Cir. 2000), 114 Harv. L. Rev. 940, 943-44 (2001) (arguing that the court failed to consider the full body of historical evidence, which suggests that the Framers might not have condemned a departure from precedent), with Evan P. Schultz, Gone Hunting: Judge Richard Arnold of the 8th Circuit Has Taken Aim at Unpublished Opinions, but Missed His Mark, Legal Times, Sept. 11, 2000, at 78 (pointing out that English courts of equity were not formally bound by precedent).

n22. Anastasoff, 223 F.3d at 903-05.

n23. Frederick Schauer, Precedent, 39 Stan. L. Rev. 571, 595-602 (1987).

n24. Id.

n25. One could argue that if the case is not citable in the future, judges will have less incentive to do a careful job and are thus more likely to get the case wrong. Surely, more time spent on a case decreases the risk of error, but most opponents of no-precedent rules for unpublished opinions do not suggest that all opinions should be as long or as carefully constructed as published opinions. Rather, they suggest that even shorter unpublished opinions should have precedential effect. See Arnold, supra note 16, at 223. If a court fails to follow precedent properly, the losing party may be able to appeal. But the fact that the case may be cited as precedent (and thus some future judge may take the time to point out the error) does not particularly help the losing party.

n26. Ronald Dworkin argues that the most fundamental of rights is the right of individuals to equal concern and respect. Justice, understood as fairness, rests upon the assumption of the existence of this axiomatic right. Ronald Dworkin, Taking Rights Seriously 180-83 (1978). The Supreme Court has recognized individual fairness as a linchpin of the justice system. See Regents of the Univ. of Cal. v. Bakke, 438 U.S. 265, 319 n.53 (1978) ("An underlying assumption of the rule of law is the worthiness of a system of justice based on fairness to the individual.").

n27. See, e.g., Arnold, supra note 16, at 221-22.

n28. See, e.g., Martin, supra note 13, at 177-83; Philip Nichols, Jr., Selective Publication of Opinions: One Judge's View, 35 Am. U. L. Rev. 909, 911-16 (1986); George M. Weaver, The Precedential Value of Unpublished Judicial Opinions, 39 Mercer L. Rev. 477, 477-49 (1988); Alex Kozinski & Stephen Reinhardt, Please Don't Cite This! Why We Don't Allow Citation to Unpublished Dispositions, Cal. Law., June 2000, at 43-44.

n29. Kozinski & Reinhardt, supra note 28, at 43-44.

n30. Anastasoff, 223 F.3d at 904.

n31. For a discussion of the economic incentives in settlement considerations, see, for example, Robert Cooter et al., Bargaining in the Shadow of the Law: A Testable Model of Strategic Behavior, 11 J. Legal Stud. 225, 238 (1982), which shows that the more steeply plaintiffs discount future payoffs, the greater the premium the litigant will place on settlement; and Richard A. Posner, An Economic Approach to Legal Procedure and Judicial Administration, 2 J. Legal Stud. 399, 417-18 (1973), which proposes a general economic model of settlement.

110 Yale L.J. 1295, *

n32. I do not want to argue that individual fairness never favors mandating the precedential effect of unpublished opinions. Certainly, individual litigants denied the ability to cite a case directly on point find themselves individually less happy. This will happen in a limited-citation regime (as, in fact, it did in Anastasoff). But there is no reason to think the burden will fall disproportionately on a certain group of litigants.

n33. Lauren K. Robel argues that not publishing opinions leads to unequal access. She claims that frequent litigants are more likely to be privy to unpublished opinions and thus more likely to be able to spot trends invisible to one-shot litigants. See Lauren K. Robel, The Myth of the Disposable Opinion: Unpublished Opinions and Government Litigants in the United States Courts of Appeals, 87 Mich. L. Rev. 940, 946, 955 (1989). This is more of an argument for publication than for giving all opinions precedential effect. Simply allowing citation to unpublished opinions might exacerbate the frequent litigant's advantage.

n34. The First, Second, Fourth, and Eighth Circuits make all opinions, whether published or not, available for free on their webpages. The Third, Sixth, Seventh, Ninth, Tenth, Eleventh, D.C., and Federal Circuits make only published or precedential opinions available on their webpages. See <http://www.uscourts.gov>. Free legal research services, such as Findlaw, do not post unpublished opinions of the circuit courts. See <http://www.findlaw.com>.

n35. Needless to say, litigants with the resources to hire more experienced lawyers (or simply more lawyers) will always have an advantage, but that does not make an institutional change that further tips the balance towards these parties fair.

n36. Arnold, supra note 16, at 221.

n37. Judge Boggs of the Sixth Circuit and Brian P. Brooks take issue with a fairness rationale, arguing that "this 'fairness' rationale cannot mean that the courts ought to adopt Harrison Bergeron-like rules that level the playing field by imposing artificial impediments on lawyers smart enough to follow developments in their field of specialty." Danny J. Boggs & Brian P. Brooks, Unpublished Opinions & the Nature of Precedent, 4 Green Bag 2d 17, 21-22 (2000). The authors worry that limiting the quantity of precedent on fairness grounds is equivalent to dumbing down the system. But pointing out that increasing the body of precedent threefold might be unfair to some litigants is hardly a call to dumb down the system. Rather, it is a call to consider the ramifications carefully before deviating from the status quo.

n38. See supra note 15 and accompanying text.