I would like to register my oppositon to proposed rules that would allow for the destruction of electronic records and thereby frustrate discovery attempts to obtain copies of this information. I owuld venture to say that most entities maintaining electronic filing systems utilize some typé of backup procedure on a regular basis which, in turn allows records to be staged on electronic media. There seems to be no earthly reason for this data to be destroyed. The procedures for saving it are already in place and the costs attendant with maintaining it are minimal.
